This thesis is dedicated to everyone who encouraged me along the way. I am forever thankful to my parents Penny and Tim Putman, who have encouraged me throughout my entire academic career, and to my friends who were there for me through some of the hardest times of my life and helped me try, even when I doubted my ability to finish.

This thesis is further dedicated to all the people of Bay County, Florida, past, present, and future. To the denizens of St. Andrews Bay, Panama City, Millville, Parker, Callaway, Lynn Haven, Southport, Youngstown, Fountain, and the Beach. Whether still living there in the place I was raised or having long ago moved on to another life in another place, I know that we will always call our little corner of the panhandle home. But to love is to take on the responsibilities of dealing with the past, and we must be willing to face facts if we are to be the citizens that such a beautiful place deserves. So, all of this is dedicated to you most of all.
Acknowledgments

My thanks go out to my major professor, Dr. Robert Tykot, and my committee members Drs. Nancy White and Thomas Pluckhahn. Thank you all for the time and effort that you have invested in myself and this project, the reviews and critiques, and most of all your patience.

Further thanks are due to the government of the City of Panama City, specifically to Mr. Keith Baker, director of the city’s Leisure Services Department and contact for the city’s Historical Cemetery Board. The city has been supportive of this project from its inception, and I am very appreciative of Mr. Baker and board member John Grant with whom I had the good fortune to speak for their time and support. The Bay County Historical Society has also been integral in my research, particularly through all their many local history resources available both online and in person through the Bay County Public Library. Finally, a special thanks to Dan and Janet Steadham, whose previous survey and mapping work was integral to this thesis.

Abstract

Mortuary research in historical archaeology has always acknowledged the cultural and symbolic links between cemeteries and the people who created them. Studies across multiple disciplines focus on what data can be gained about past societies from historical cemeteries, and they tend to ascribe to an understanding of the ‘cemetery-as-model.’ This idea of the local burial ground as a mirror of the community that formed it seems reasonable, even logical, but few of these studies have taken the time to compare the historical context of the societies in question to the results of their cemetery analyses. The assumption of the cemetery as a social mirror has continued to be implemented in research despite its apparent untested nature.

Historical archaeology as a discipline that embraces both material culture and documentary evidence is uniquely suited to test this cemetery-as-model premise. In this thesis I set out to determine the representative qualities of the community cemetery by investigating historical Millville and Greenwood cemeteries in Panama City, Florida. To do this I focused on the social phenomenon that was racial segregation, employing a combined Marxian-landscape approach to understand the way that segregation effected both social and spatial relationships as a manifestation of the ideology of racism. By treating headstones as both artifact and text and cross-referencing these data with various historical documents, I was able to assess the distribution of race on the landscape of each cemetery. I then used the spatial data associated with the headstones to map the racial data onto the landscape of the cemetery in order to assess the representation of segregation in the burial grounds.
I found that both Millville and Greenwood cemeteries exhibited what I refer to as external, or inter-cemetery segregation, rather than internal, or intra-cemetery segregation. This type of segregation does not correspond with the way this form of racial injustice existed in the history of Panama City. I explain this discrepancy as a form of structural violence, the effect of those in power reflecting the ideology of racism and legitimizing white cultural hegemony through the policies of these municipal cemeteries. These results suggest that the reflexive nature of the relationship between burial grounds and their communities is too complex to default to assumptions of cemetery-as-model without careful consideration of the historical context on a case-by-case basis.
Chapter 1:

Introduction

This research is centered on the idea of the community cemetery as a representation of a particular community as it changes through time. Many may look at a historical or modern cemetery and think little about its utility or existence beyond the necessity of having a place to house and visit the dead. But cemeteries are more than a collection of holes in the ground, they are built landscapes that exist within a larger context that is both local and cultural. By starting with the broader cultural context and bringing it down to the local level, I believe it is possible to investigate the community cemetery in a way which reveals both its community’s commitment to those cultural norms and to a representation of reality as that community experienced it.

In order to do this, I have focused on the historical phenomenon of American racial segregation and the historical communities that now make up present-day Panama City, Florida. More specifically this research focuses on the historical segregation of white Americans and African Americans in Bay County (Figure 1), and how it relates to Millville (FMSF Site ID: BY02964) and Greenwood (no extant ID) cemeteries, the two oldest extant municipal burial grounds in the city. Like any other place in the southern United States, racial segregation was a general rule when Florida became a territory and became law following the end of the Civil War and the onset of the Jim Crow era. The initial African American population of Bay County consisted of both free and enslaved people, and as time progressed this population would form a large community on the south side of St. Andrew Bay and neighborhoods within the towns of St.
Andrew, Panama City, and Millville. Though these African American communities were eventually considered a valued part of the larger, white-dominated society, they endured the injustices of the Jim Crow South as did many across the country. Between the years 1920 and 1960, African Americans accounted for an average 23% of the population of Bay County, never surpassing one third of the total population.

Hypothesis and Research Questions

This thesis is essentially a different perspective on the kind of study undertaken by Edwin Dethlefsen in Central Florida. My primary research question is designed around Dethlefsen’s idea of cemetery-as-model:
A cemetery should reflect the local, historical flow of attitudes about community. It is, after all, a community of the dead, created, maintained, and preserved by the community of the living. In many ways it should be a ‘filtered’ and modified reflection of the living community, with an added dimension of controlled chronological depth… If we accept that a community is an adaptive system all of whose parts are more or less delicately adjusted to one another, and then if we look at the cemetery as a limited reflection of the real community, we might begin to see a model of the general workings of the larger system—we might learn how to expose details of synergistic interaction among the ‘institutions’ of a functioning ‘culture’ [Dethlefsen 1981:137-141].

Dethlefsen clearly took a neoevolutionary approach to his thesis, using culture history to understand communities that are made up of ‘parts’ that are adapted to one another. Hence, he proceeded by measuring the frequency of various types and shapes of headstones, their aesthetic forms, the content of their epitaphs, and differing inscriptions over time, using abductive reasoning to come to the most likely explanation for these changes.

But for some factions in past societies, their ‘delicate adjustment to one another’ is defined by ideological and physical conflict, domination, and cultural hegemony. Testing virtually the same hypothesis, I employ a Marxian-landscape perspective, examining grave markers as materializations of ideology, both artifact and text, cross-referencing their textual data with historical documents and their associated spatial data on the landscape in order to shed light on the relationship between racial segregation in the community and the cemetery.

Thus, I have reformulated the idea of cemetery-as-model into the hypothesis of this thesis: that cemeteries are faithful representations of their communities. By ‘faithful representation’ I mean that community cemeteries should be representative of both the population of that community (demographically) and spatially representative of the sociocultural phenomena experienced by those people (culturally). Since the focus of this study is specifically the known phenomenon of segregation, supporting questions arise to provide clarity: Do Millville and Greenwood cemeteries exhibit racial segregation? If so, then how does the phenomenon manifest spatially on the landscape of the cemetery? Do the qualitative aspects of the cemetery segregation faithfully mirror the way segregation was manifested in the past communities of Panama City? I will return to these questions definitively in Chapter 6.

Cemetery Background

First used in the 1860s and 1880s respectively, Millville and Greenwood cemeteries are the oldest cemeteries in the Panama City area. Sometime between the 1820s and 1840s an older cemetery had been established at Old Town St. Andrews, one of the first towns on the bay, but it was an unfortunate victim of development and so no longer exists. Millville Cemetery was initially land set aside as a public cemetery by William Holmes when he homesteaded the area east of Watson Bayou during the Civil War. The sawmill industry and its town grew up on the land that the Holmes family patented, and the cemetery was used for many years prior to being dedicated as Millville Cemetery in 1908. This burial ground saw use for over a century following its dedication, with interments continuing well into the 2000s. Greenwood Cemetery was originally called St. Andrews Cemetery and was dedicated by the St. Andrews Bay Railroad, Land, and Mining Company in 1889. While this mail-order real estate company failed to produce any of the other amenities in its name, the land it put forward for the cemetery was a substantial ten acres, much larger than Millville Cemetery. In a similar manner to Millville, Greenwood’s usage began prior to its official dedication, with the first recorded burial occurring in 1886 (Womack 1994, 1998).

Like many places in the South, Panama City is also home to several old African American cemeteries. However, there is a discrepancy between the African American history of the area and the dates of establishment of these cemeteries. The Panama City Black Cemetery was established in 1908, at the edge of a swamp north of Panama City Cemetery, now known as Oakland Cemetery. This African American cemetery was on the west side of Panama City, near St. Andrews. Unfortunately, the Black Cemetery was lost to development in the 1960s. St. Andrews’ first cemetery for its African American citizens came about in 1914, after Richard Covington buried his wife and daughter on his property on the northeastern edge of town. Thereafter, Mr. Covington allowed many to bury on his land, never dedicated but today known as Covington Cemetery. While this burial ground once spanned several blocks just south of Greenwood Cemetery, many of the wooden markers were lost to forest fires and most of the cemetery was eventually taken over by development. All that remains of Covington Cemetery is the small fenced-in family plot between two strip malls. In 1916 Millville received its first African American Cemetery, and St. Andrews gained a second. Originally the Colored People’s Cemetery of Millville, Redwood Cemetery sits a few blocks northwest of Millville Cemetery, just east of Panama City’s African American community called Glenwood (Womack 1998, 2001, 2008). I provide a more complete history of the region, from prehistoric to modern times in Chapter 2 of this thesis.

Theoretical Background

This study takes inspiration from many works of archaeology, history, and cultural geography. Many of these projects deal with cemeteries or conceptions of race in the past, and a few, though very few, approach both subjects. Perhaps most influential among them has been the cemetery research of Edwin Dethlefsen (1981), who has spent many years studying various aspects of the archaeological and cultural significance of historic cemeteries throughout the United States.
It is from his cemetery-as-model concept that I drew the hypothesis and research questions of the current study, namely that community cemeteries are a reflection of the populations in which they are located. Specifically, the demographics of the cemetery population and the spatial representation of cultural-historical phenomena should mirror those found in the broader community of the same historical context. In order to test this idea beyond previously conducted assessments of the symbolic content of headstones, their styles and distributions, I have turned my attention to the local history of racial segregation in the Panama City area and the question of its representation in the historical cemeteries of St. Andrews and Millville.

In order to understand the societal phenomenon of segregation and how it could be given materiality through these cemeteries, I have made use of a perspective derivative of both Marxist and landscape archaeologies. Such critical traditions have long been used by historical archaeologists working with early modern sites created in capitalist societies, especially when they involved conditions of sociocultural conflict and the built environment. These two theoretical approaches are unified in their vision of the reflexive nature of the relationships between material artifacts, cultural landscapes, and the past peoples who made them. This allows for a framework that uses spatial data related to archaeological evidence to investigate the cultural impact of an ideology of racism, in this case the institution of segregation. I address all of this in more depth in Chapter 3.
Chapter Outline

As previously mentioned, in Chapters 2 and 3 I go into far more depth on the historical and theoretical backgrounds that inform the breadth of this study. In the next chapter I provide an overview of the region that became present-day Bay County, Florida (Figure 2), from prehistory up through the early twentieth century, including the history of the various cemeteries of Panama City. Then in Chapter 3 I cover several of the studies that inspired this study, its focus on historical cemeteries and racial discrimination, followed by the concepts from Marxist philosophy and landscape archaeology that apply to a spatial, archaeological study of racial segregation. In Chapter 4 I explain my methodology for approaching the research questions discussed above, including its basis in a landscape approach to archaeology. These methods include data acquisition and organization, ground truthing field survey and photo mapping, correlation of headstones with historical documents, qualitative thematic mapping, and spatial analysis of Millville and Greenwood Cemeteries. In Chapter 5, I present the results of my analysis, most notably through the mapping of census- and other historical document-based racial categorizations onto the landscape of the historical cemeteries. Finally, in Chapter 6 I discuss the results of the mapping, interpret them using a Marxian-landscape theoretical approach, address the hypothesis, and answer my research questions. I also speak to the significance of my findings for a recent archaeological cemetery study that briefly mentions Millville cemetery in the course of its research. This is followed by a brief conclusion and suggestions for similar research in the future.
Chapter 2:

History

Prehistory

The first citizens of the area that would become known as the Florida Panhandle were the Native American peoples. These Paleoindian peoples arrived in Florida around 15,000 B.C. when the shoreline of the Gulf of Mexico was around 15 miles farther south of where it lies now, as the sea level was about 400 feet lower than it is at present. St. Andrew’s Bay, for which Bay County would later be named, was a high and dry area at this point and nearby Econfina Creek, which supplies much of the county’s fresh water, created a valley running south to the coast (Houpt 2007; Milanich 1996).

Over the centuries preceding the arrival of European explorers, the Native Americans created intricate cultures and lived in an area much larger than that which makes up the Panhandle today. Paleoindian material culture was superseded technologically by Early Archaic cultures sometime around 8000 B.C., and this period lasted until the end of the Late Archaic period around 650 B.C. Archaic societies consisted of small groups of hunter-gatherers who gradually came to incorporate seasonal fishing to their lifeways. Around 650 B.C. the archaeological record shows the development of increased ceremonialism, social stratification, sedentism, and seasonal forager subsistence associated with the Early Woodland, followed by larger groupings of people and the introduction of horticulture around 300 A.D., the Middle Woodland period. These people built large sand burial mounds, though this practice ceased in the Late Woodland period, which lasted until around 950 A.D. At this point in time societies began to develop intensive agricultural lifeways, which encouraged even more sedentism, resulting in large villages, more cultural diversity, and increased complexity of ceremonial life, including the creation of temple mounds. These cultures are referred to as Mississippian, and it is these peoples who eventually met the Spanish upon their arrival in Florida in the sixteenth century (White 2018).

In the Panama City area, the prehistoric Native American presence is seen archaeologically primarily through the remains of dozens of extensive shell middens and sand mounds all over St. Andrew’s Bay. Up and down the coast of the mainland, on the West Bay, and both the West and East Peninsulas these Woodland period constructions can be found. In many cases the mounds were used for burials, primarily secondary bundled or skull burials, and contained many varied grave goods, especially early Weeden Island complex pottery. Several of these impressive sites were located directly on the coast in the areas that would become St. Andrews and Millville, within a few miles to the south of the cemeteries focused on in this thesis. This includes a prehistoric burial ground at Buena Vista Point which, though heavily looted by the 1940s, was associated with Ft. Walton incised ceramics from the Mississippian period (Willey 1998). The remains of this burial site lie under a public park, just over a mile to the southwest of Greenwood Cemetery.

Several sources, including archaeologists C. B. Moore and Gordon Willey, describe the impressive expanse of the shell midden deposits in this area, and note their makeup being primarily that of oyster, with scallop and conch included to a lesser degree, mirroring the diet choices of the Early and Middle Woodland peoples that built them (Willey 1998). Florida Master Site File entries for archaeological sites in Panama City are primarily these midden and mound sites, but also include a handful of lithic scatter sites. Most of these lithic sites are located farther inland, and a few include Florida Archaic Stemmed projectile points that date to the Middle Archaic period, lasting from around 6000-3500 B.C. (White 2018).

Colonial Period

In the 1500s, Europeans and their African slaves set out west across the Atlantic Ocean to the New World, as unsuspecting Mississippian-era Native American groups perfected their largest and most complex societies. The arrival of Europeans had relatively little effect on southern Bay County; though there may have been some brief encounters along the coast, the narrowness of the St. Andrew’s Bay inlet seems to have discouraged exploration therein. The material culture of the Panama City area sites reflects this, with very few European ceramics, such as a Spanish olive jar sherd and some fragments of olive-green glass, appearing in a handful of otherwise Native American assemblages. An equally small number of sites in this area include Lamar-type ceramics of Native American origin that date to around 1700 A.D., in the Protohistoric and late First Spanish periods, and may have been related to local Creeks or refugees fleeing the Spanish Mission system (White 2018). The Panama City area was continually overlooked by Europeans aside from a coastal survey in 1764 at the beginning of the British period. The survey was performed by Scottish Admiral George Gauld, who charted the Gulf Coast from the Suwannee River to the Mississippi, including St. Andrew’s Bay (West 1922; Womack 1994). Gauld’s crew noted that the Panama City area seemed promising, worth an attempt at settlement, but the British government was too focused on the Pensacola region to the west to take any action in the area (Fabel 1996).

The first effects of war on the central Panhandle occurred in 1814, when the British built a fort at Prospect Bluff on the Apalachicola River. The Negro Fort, as it was called, was populated primarily by liberated African American slaves, along with Seminole, Choctaw, and Lower Creek people from the area. The inhabitants of the fort were recruited into the Corps of Colonial Marines and trained by British Royal Marine and abolitionist Col. Edward Nicolls with the mission of freeing American slaves by raiding the southern United States. Later that year the War of 1812 finally reached the western Panhandle, with the American military engaging the forces of England and Spain along with their African American and Creek allies at Pensacola. In 1815 the British left the fort to their armed subjects, and it quickly became the largest Maroon community in the continent, making it a major problem for the pro-slavery South (Millet 2014). The fear inspired by an armed force of non-whites in a foreign territory so close to Georgia attracted the attention of the U.S. government and inspired an illegal invasion by Andrew Jackson’s military forces in 1816. The U.S. naval assault on the fort ended quickly when a cannonball hit the community’s powder stores, effectively detonating both half of the fort and its inhabitants. Of the survivors of the battle hundreds of Native Americans and former slaves escaped the area and retreated southeast, farther into Florida, but a number of the survivors were either executed or returned to slavery. The Battle of Prospect Bluff demonstrated the U.S. government’s willingness to protect slave owners’ interests by life and limb, and served to encourage Jackson in his undertaking of the First Seminole War (Clavin 2019).

After the Battle of Negro Fort, the Seminole people and their black allies increased attacks against the American people. When an 1817 assault on a Seminole town resulted in a retaliatory attack on Fort Scott in southern Georgia, Andrew Jackson and around 3,500 men campaigned against the Seminole in March of 1818. After relieving Fort Scott, the U.S. military marched into Spanish East Florida, rebuilt the destroyed Negro Fort as the American Fort Gadsden, before going on to take St. Marks and attack Maroon communities along the Suwannee River. Shortly thereafter Jackson and his men moved into West Florida, passed through the central Panhandle, and wrested control of Pensacola in late May (Field 2009; Womack 1994). This fort, around 40 miles to the east, north of Apalachicola, was as close as Euro-American settlement came to the Panama City area in almost 300 years of European colonialism.

Territorial Period

The government of Spain protested the illegal invasion, but simply lacked the means to populate and protect the long unprofitable colony from outside influence. As such, the two countries came together with the Adams-Onis Treaty of 1819, which ceded Florida to the United States. The treaty was fully ratified in 1821 with Andrew Jackson serving as de facto governor until the following year, when East and West Florida were united under the new territorial government in Tallahassee (Millet 2014; Field 2009).

Initially, many white settlers from the Deep South states came to the “Middle Florida” region of the Panhandle, between the Apalachicola and Suwannee Rivers. The region was known to be ideal for cotton farming, and the American plantation complex became heavily rooted in the area (Smith 2017). This involved mass importation of African American slaves from other parts of the country, who were met by a severe set of slave codes that encouraged the violent, reactionary society they found themselves subject to. At the time of transfer from Spain to America there were at least 12,000 African-descended people in Florida. Some were slaves to masters who did not leave, while many others lived free in their own communities or with the Seminole (Millet 2014). Part of the treaty required that any free black Spaniards would be recognized as citizens of the United States post-transfer. Despite this, within forty years the plantation system would see 63,000 African Americans enslaved in Florida (Millet 2014; Smith 2000).
As part of the territorial acquisition the government instituted the county system, which turned West Florida into Escambia County and East Florida into St. Johns County. With the opening of the Florida Territory, American settlers began populating the central Panhandle, including some of Andrew Jackson’s men who had served in the First Seminole War (Walters 2008; Womack 1994). As more people settled the area more counties developed out of Escambia County, notably Jackson County in 1822, from which came Walton County in 1824, Washington County in 1825, and Calhoun County in 1838. The St. Andrew’s Bay area existed within Washington County until 1913, when portions of Washington, Calhoun, and Walton counties combined to form Bay County (Rucker 2011; Smith 2000).

It did not take long for settlers from the upper southern states to find their way to St. Andrew’s Bay. Some of the wealthier settlers who moved to the area brought their slaves with them, especially those who settled Econfina north of the bay. By 1824 there were a few log cabin homes built at a site on the bayside that became known as Old Town St. Andrews (Figure 3). In the next year a thirty-five-man petition from residents moved Congress to grant St. Andrews port-of-entry status, supervised by Pensacola. This allowed the immediate and surrounding communities in Jackson and Walton Counties to ship such goods as cattle, cotton, and lumber internationally, and import goods like coffee (Smith 2000; Womack 1994). There were forty families living in the Old Town area by 1827, including former Georgia governor John Clark, though few lived there year-round. Many lived and worked farther inland and would travel by wagon to vacation on the bay, often bringing their servants with them. At this time, those who resided in the area mostly subsisted by fishing and oystering, boarding visitors, or producing salt (Bouler 2007; Cvitkovich 2000; Houpt 2007; Womack 1994).
The early 1830s witnessed the introduction of an industry new to the area that would have a large impact on St. Andrew’s Bay. It was around this time that James and Henry Watson came to the area and purchased thousands of acres of land surrounding Old Town St. Andrews and stretching a few miles east along the coast to Watson Bayou. The land was untouched forest perfect for lumbering, and by 1837 the Watsons had built a sawmill on a small interior island on the eastern side of the bayou and obtained a charter from the territorial government for their Washington Lumber Company. The company provided lumber for railroads in the region and for construction around St. Joseph Bay to the east. There were several hundred employees, both black and white, housed in workers’ quarters in Old Town, who traveled to the mill each day on a road constructed by the company. However, within a few years the timber needs of the area had been fully met, which caused the closure of the sawmill, and ownership of the Watsons’ properties reverted to the territorial government due to a situation with the Washington Lumber Company’s taxes (Smith 2000). Though the Watsons’ plans fell through, their initial success inspired others to further the lumber industry in the same area, which would soon become known as Millville.

In 1832, Jose Massalieno reached the East Peninsula on St. Andrew’s Bay, a land formation in the middle of the bay directly south of Massalina Bayou and what would soon become Panama City. Jose was a free black Spaniard who had opted to stay in Florida when it became a U.S. territory, and he had taken a merchant ship to St. Joseph before traveling about thirty miles west to the neighboring bay area. Once there, Jose established a homestead at Redfish Point on the peninsula and began building a life as a fisherman. Within a few years Jose traveled to a plantation in Georgia to purchase manumission for a woman to become his wife, and by 1840 the Massalienos had the first of their eight children, Narcisco, who would come to be known as Hawk Massalina. As a young man, Hawk worked as a fisherman and caretaker of those properties at Old Town that were owned by non-locals, until the onset of the Civil War. Hawk’s family has continued to educate the local public about his life (Spears 2020), more of which is mentioned in the pages below. The legislative session of 1847 required free black citizens to have a white citizen as a “guardian,” a role that in the Massalienos lives was filled by former Seminole War scout and plantation owner Walter Gainer of Econfina, who resided in northern Bay County. Betsey, Hawk’s sister, would go on to marry Primas Gainer, a freedman of the Gainer plantation. The family would weather hurricanes and war at Redfish Point before the homestead would become one of the earliest and largest African American communities in Florida (see Tables 1 & 2) (McCarthy 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 1994, 2001).

Missing numbers represented by an ‘x’ indicate that Calhoun County was not created until 1838, and the abolition of slavery in 1865 (USDC 1872, 1901, 1913).

Statehood

In 1845, Florida became the twenty-seventh state in the Union and the territorial government was replaced by the first state legislature. Two years prior, the territorial government had moved for a town to be established at St. Andrew’s Bay, which made Old Town St. Andrews the first official town in the area. Many planters in the county-built houses on the coastal bluff at Old Town to take in the breeze, as much of the interior land surrounding the bay was quite swampy. At this time the summer population of St. Andrews was between 1,200 and 1,500 persons, most of whom came to enjoy the “healing waters” of the beach. Those who passed away during their time on the bay were buried in a cemetery now lost to time and development about half a mile north of Old Town (Bouler 2007; Cvitkovich 2000; Houpt 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 1994).

Between 1840 and 1860, the Florida Panhandle was prosperous for planters of all stripes. Around this time the first settlers of Panama City, located between St. Andrews and Millville, homesteaded a pecan grove and operated a goat farm there. Others planted orange groves in the area, however it was primarily the price of cotton that escalated as the plantation system expanded, which further caused the value of individual slaves to rise. When Florida seceded from the Union in 1861 the slave interests of Middle Florida were the deciding factor, as this region hosted the state capitol, and northwest and eastern Florida were home to considerable numbers of Unionists. At the time of secession, Florida had the smallest population of any of the Confederate States, around 140,000 people in all, forty-five percent of whom were enslaved African Americans (Millet 2014; Smith 2000; Womack 1994).

With the onset of the Civil War, any plans for development of the St. Andrew’s Bay area were put on hold. There were still only around forty families living on the north side of the bay, so only a few able-bodied men joined the Confederate army. Most of the support afforded to the Southern cause came in the form of fish and cattle, along with salt, which soon became a large industry in the area (Cvitkovich 2000). Salt workers were exempt from military service and the payment of taxes to the Confederate government for relatively easy work boiling salt water in large kettles over brick fire pits (Walters 2008). There were hundreds of such salt-making ventures around the bay, including factory-sized operations, employing around 5,000 men in total (Bouler 2007). The Confederacy relied on salt for preservation of rations, and when Apalachicola and Pensacola came under Union control, St. Andrew’s Bay became one of the most important places in the state. Protection of the valuable saltworks was the job of three Confederate companies, though many left the area when Federal forces destroyed their boats. A blockade was put into effect along the Florida coast early on, but it proved largely unsuccessful in the Panhandle, with the bay being too large for the gunboats that patrolled there to effectively stop blockade-running. Union barracks were constructed on Hurricane Island, a few miles southeast of Old Town where the bay inlet was, and a small prison camp and wharf were constructed at Redfish Point (Smith 2000; Womack 1994).

In 1862 there was a minor assault on Old Town when Federal troops aboard a steamship sighted Confederate soldiers ashore, however they were unable to find their nemeses in town and so took supplies and damaged some saltworks on their way back to the ship. Then in March of 1863 around seven crewmen from a Union ship entered Old Town to retrieve supplies of fresh water from the local inn when they were ambushed by Confederates. A firefight ensued upon the Federal men’s refusal to surrender, and a truce was only reached after two Union soldiers were dead and the rest were wounded. The wounded returned to their ship and departed, whereupon affairs in town returned to normal for several months. News of the Emancipation Proclamation reached the Bay County area on May 20th, which was celebrated as “Freedom Day” by the local African American community for many decades. Retribution for the earlier skirmish arrived in December when a Federal barque took position on the coast and opened fire, completely leveling all thirty-two buildings of Old Town St. Andrews (Cvitkovich 2000; Houpt 2007). Hawk Massalina was taking care of the summer homes around the time the bombardment occurred and managed to avoid injury. After the witnessing the destruction of Old Town Massalina enlisted in the U.S. Navy as a gun cleaner aboard Union vessels and guided forces to various active saltwork locations of which he had firsthand knowledge. After the end of the Civil War in 1865, Hawk’s familial settlement at Redfish Point grew exponentially as newly freed African Americans sought a new life around the bay (McCarthy 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 1994, 2001).

While the most significant action the Civil War brought to St. Andrew’s Bay occurred at Old Town, progress was being made to the east of Watson Bayou. In 1863, William Holmes settled near the bay in the area east of the old Watson sawmill. Holmes had come to make salt for the Confederacy, and when his wife Louisa arrived in the area they homesteaded the area known as Millville. William created a fishing company which bore the family name, built boats and traded with Pensacola, and in 1891 Louisa patented most of the land that makes up the town today. As part of the initial homestead, Holmes had set aside some land for a community burial ground that would be dedicated as Millville Cemetery in 1908. Beginning around 1898, a series of mills replaced the old Washington Lumber Company on Watson Bayou. The renewal of the timber industry brought hundreds of workers to the area who built up a town around the sawmill, and by 1910 Millville was the bay’s largest community with a population of about 2,000 (Houpt 2005; Smith 2000; Womack 1994, 1998).

After the leveling of Old Town and the end of the Civil War, few people lived on the bay with somewhere between twenty-five to thirty families remaining in the area. Florida was readmitted to the Union in 1868, but St. Andrews as a community effectively laid dormant until 1879 when Lambert Ware settled in the area and bought a large tract of land that included Buena Vista Point, then called Ware’s Point. In 1882 Ware’s brother Frank arrived and together they operated a trading ship, wharf, mercantile store, and the local post office (Cvitkovich 2000; Houpt 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 1994). “Wareville” or “Waretown,” as it was referred to, was a new beginning for St. Andrews and it did not take long for Northern enterprises to take interest in the area.
In 1880 residents owned title to only 3,000 acres of what would soon be Bay County, with 450,000 acres retained by the government. Five years later the St. Andrews Bay Railroad, Land, and Mining Company, a mail-order real estate venture based in Cincinnati, Ohio, bought 20,000 acres in the area and began an advertising campaign. Many buyers enticed by the offer arrived in St. Andrews by boat only to find that their prospective property was swampland or otherwise inundated. Between the misrepresentation of the land and the Cincinnati company’s inability to construct the railroad or mining companies represented in its name, some newcomers left to homestead other areas on the bay (Bouler 2007). Those who stayed in town could choose to have a house built by the company with lumber sourced from nearby sawmills and camped on the beach in tents until construction was complete. All in all, around 350,000 people were brought into the area by the scheme and by 1890 sales had virtually ceased, as the only remaining properties were considered too far from town at a distance of two miles. While the St. Andrews Bay Railroad, Land, and Mining Company had failed to provide any infrastructure to the community, it did set aside ten acres of land for use as St. Andrews Cemetery, now known as Greenwood Cemetery. The land was a mile and one-half northeast of town and was dedicated in 1889, though the earliest recorded adult burial dates to 1886 (Cvitkovich 2000; Smith 2000; Womack 1994).

Outside of Redfish Point, the African American communities of Bay County formed with the expansion of Wareville-St. Andrews and Panama City in the 1880s. The Hill was St. Andrews’ African American neighborhood, it originated as a four block by four block community east of Waretown and north of Old Town, bordered on the north by Greenwood Cemetery. Those who came to the Hill looked to leave farming life behind and enter the fishing, lumber, or naval stores industries (Cain 2020; Womack 2008). The situation was similar for those who moved to Panama City, then known as Harrison. There the African American community was known as East End as it was the easternmost portion of town, along the western side of Watson Bayou. In 1888, George Thompson homesteaded the remaining land of Panama City (Figure 4) and set up a sawmill near the innermost part of Massalina Bayou, effectively on the southwestern edge of East End. Men from the community were uniquely positioned to join the burgeoning timber industry, especially after the mill on Watson Bayou opened again in 1898. As East End developed it became known as Shinetown and eventually became Glenwood, as the area is known today (Burch 2020; McCarthy 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 1998, 2015). While an exact date remains unclear, it would seem that Millville’s African American community grew up around the same time, possibly as an extension of neighboring Glenwood. The lumber industry was starting back up in the area, poised to make the town the largest on the bay within a decade (Womack 1994). In any case, the community was large enough by 1900 to open the first church in Millville, St. James African Methodist (Houpt 2005).

While the community cemeteries of Millville and St. Andrews had their origins in the 1860s and 1880s, it was almost forty years before cemeteries specifically for the African American citizens of Bay County were established. Originally known as the Colored People’s Cemetery of Millville, Redwood Cemetery was dedicated in 1916 on the eastern end of Watson Bayou. About half a mile north of the sawmill and just east of Glenwood across the bayou, Redwood Cemetery is the final resting place of Hawk Massalina, along with many others from Glenwood and Millville. Hawk had wished to be buried next to his father in the graveyard of New Judson Missionary Baptist Church on Redfish Point, but could not be due to the seizure of the property by the government in 1941. Hawk died in 1948 at age 108 and was buried next to his grandson, Andrew Cooper (Burch 2020; McCarthy 2007; Smith 2000; Womack 2001). The Hill community had two cemeteries to choose from in St. Andrews, the Covington and Hillside Cemeteries. Much of Covington Cemetery was never officially designated for burial use, as it was initially a garden where Richard Covington buried his wife and daughter in 1914. Eventually the cemetery took over the four modern blocks just south of Greenwood Cemetery, which was then a woodland on the northeastern boundary of the Hill. Over time the wooden grave markers were destroyed by forest fires, leaving only the stone markers of the Covington family plot visible. A Covington descendant, Mamie Richardson, had the remaining plot fenced in with chain-link before she passed and was buried there in 1962. This small fenced-in section is all that remains of the cemetery, now fronted by a road and bordered by strip malls. Hillside Cemetery was established in 1916 about three-quarters of a mile directly north of Covington Cemetery, past Greenwood Cemetery. It was known as Pinewood Cemetery at the time and was largely bypassed in favor of Redwood Cemetery due to its remote location (Smith 2000; Womack 1998, 2008). Panama City had its own African American burial ground on the far western edge of town toward St. Andrews, about half a mile east of Covington Cemetery and half a mile north of Oakland Cemetery. The Black Cemetery, as it was called, was established in 1908 on the edge of a large swampland at the same time as Oakland, then called Panama City Cemetery. This cemetery was well used by both the Hill and Glenwood communities, as it was the first and only community cemetery in the area specifically for African Americans and remained so for six years. In 1934 the state used the land south of the cemetery as a convict camp and buried deceased convicts in the Black Cemetery. Many of the graves were unmarked, and by the 1960s the cemetery property became valuable and thirty identifiable graves were moved to Lynn Haven Community Cemetery about five miles northeast (McCarthy 2007; Womack 1998). The locations of Panama City’s historical cemeteries can be seen in Figure 5.

The African American communities continued to grow along with their municipalities. St. Andrews incorporated in 1908, followed shortly by Panama City in 1909, and Millville did the same in 1913 (Hollis 2004; Houpt 2005, 2007). The St. Andrew’s Bay area became part of Bay County when it was established in 1913, with Panama City elected as the county seat the following year. St. Andrews and Millville were annexed by Panama City in 1926. In 1941 the East Peninsula was taken by the government through eminent domain in order to build Tyndall Field, now Air Force Base, and the Hill and Glenwood neighborhoods accommodated the entire population of Redfish Point (Smith 2000; Womack 1994, 2001). The onset of World War II caused the area to grow exponentially, primarily due to Tyndall Field, the construction of a U.S. naval base on Panama City Beach, and the local Wainwright shipyard which was contracted to construct over one hundred vessels for the war effort (Mormino 1996; Rucker 2011; Walters 2008). The population of Bay County grew from 20,686 in 1940 to well over 42,000 in 1950, with the collective African American community of the county representing seventeen percent of the total population (Jackson 2012; USDC 1950).

Chapter 3:

Theory

The cemetery is an inherently symbolic place as it serves utilitarian, cultural, and psychosocial needs simultaneously. As humans we need a place to keep and visit those who have died, a place to gather in groups to perform funerary ritual and to memorialize the dead. To say that we need a liminal space within which we can safely imagine and experience death is to venture into the world of philosophy and psychoanalysis, but to acknowledge that this is a role that every cemetery plays is to simply recognize fact. With this basic concept of the cemetery as a symbolic space it is not hard to imagine that such burial places, these built environments of death, may exhibit other layers of meaning both within and without. These layers of meaning could even shed light on the darker corners of our social history.

In order to approach these layers of meaning within the context of this study, this chapter is divided into four further sections. The first section is focused on relevant areas of historical archaeological and other anthropological research, as well as that from other disciplines, primarily studies of cemeteries and the investigation of racial inequality. The second applies the concepts of Marxist theory to a study of racial segregation. The third section introduces landscape archaeology as a theoretical perspective that may help to further explicate the relationship of segregation to the American cemetery. The chapter concludes with a brief synthesis of the ideas discussed herein.
Review of Literature on Cemeteries and Racism

The corpus of work on cemeteries runs the gamut from experimental to theoretical, and includes a diverse group of scholars such as archaeologists, cultural geographers, and historians. Here I discuss studies related to cemeteries and race which I found helpful in developing both my research and interpretive framework.

Edwin Dethlefsen and James Deetz (1966) are perhaps the first archaeologists who come to mind when one considers the historic American cemetery. Their study on the variation of headstones in the seventeenth and eighteenth century cemeteries of Massachusetts, and what they reveal about the people they are associated with, is still considered one of the landmark cases of mortuary archaeology. Their work highlighted the fact that the designs of headstones possess not only spatial and temporal limitations, but cultural meaning through their folk-art component. The authors connected changes in style of the headstones to their associated dates and then to cultural events and norms, including the Great Awakening and Puritanism. Dethlefsen and Deetz found that change in style initiates slowly by a small number of individuals, increases exponentially, and then drops off upon the entrance of a new design, and also that religious belief and regulation plays a large part in what is displayed on the gravestones. Their conclusions pointed to the gravestones being firmly rooted in the culture by which they were produced, and that in order to successfully reconstruct the past, one must must be aware of the interplay between culture and artifacts.

Edwin Dethlefsen (1981) continued to work with cemeteries after his partnership with Deetz, expanding his analyses of cemeteries from the Northeast to the American South. In this case, he decided to focus on changes in various trends observed within rural Florida cemeteries, including the content of epitaphs, expressed religious sentiment, and the placement of family groups, in order to extrapolate what these changes say about the broader culture over time. A major variable in this study is the spatial arrangement of the headstones on the landscape of the cemetery, and the same variable can be extended to an analysis of the placement of the cemetery in the community as well. In Dethlefsen’s view the cemetery is a collection of data that is spatially specific and easily controllable due to its very nature; akin to an archaeological collection kept permanently in situ. Furthermore, the community is a multivocal adaptive system that works to retain social cohesion, thus by examining a community cemetery one may decipher a model of the society’s circumstances at any moment in time. I refer to this as the cemetery-as-mirror model; the idea that the cemetery exists as a reflection of the living community that made it. Dethlefsen’s work is formative for this thesis, and his model serves as its hypothesis, namely that the municipal cemetery is culturally and demographically representative of the living community that produced and maintains it over time. The primary method by which I test this hypothesis is by determining whether or not the cemetery faithfully represents the historic racial segregation endemic to the community.

When approaching topics like race and class, it is important to know something of their evolution within the discipline one is a part of. Jamie Brandon (2009) provided such an overview for archaeology, tracing the archaeology of inequality from the beginnings the Civil Rights movement to current day perspectives and practices. He pointed out that the ideas of race and class that we have today are modern inventions that cannot be separated from Western capitalism, and that racial identities could vary based on location and class. Marxist theorists have tended to focus on racial divisions in the working class, but newer theoretical frameworks including critical, mutualistic, and vindicationist archaeologies have emphasized reflexivity between race and class, and used various critical theories to make symbolic interpretations of artifacts and landscapes. A mutualistic archaeology, advocated by Charles Orser (1996), is primarily focused on how the relationships and interactions between individuals create reality through mutual (mis)understandings, goals, and attitudes. From this perspective, people do not act because of their embedded sense of society or culture, rather they act in relation to, and with, other people. Since all people are connected by some relationship to others, these network connections are what drive society and build culture. These historical archaeologies tend to look at the effects of modernity, eurocentrism, capitalism, and colonialism on subaltern peoples, artifacts, and physical space (Orser 1996). Critical archaeologies apply the critical theory of the Frankfurt school and are very focused on issues of power and ideology, especially as a mystifying factor. The paradigm is almost synonymous with Mark Leone and his Archaeology in Annapolis Project, who applied the Marxist-based theoretical writings of Habermas, Lukacs, and Althusser to archaeological interpretation in order forward democratic action and social justice in society. As such, a critical historical archaeology works to reveal the contradictions of life that are normally hidden or normalized by various ideologies. The contradictions inherent in capitalism, social hierarchies, power relations, and the historical and archaeological disciplines are common areas of research (Leone 2016). Vindicationist archaeologies have their theoretical roots in critical race theory and diaspora vindicationist scholarship, using the archaeological record to illuminate African American experiences throughout history. As a critical tradition, these archaeologies are explicitly political, challenging assumptions about the past, the ideologies behind dominant representations, and its own position in society. Studies often address slavery and plantation life, antiracist resistance, and American and global imperialism and racial ideology (Mullins 2008). Brandon advocates cultural analysis as a contextual approach to identities in the past, rather than studying their class and racial elements separately, along with a focus on the structural inequalities that came between those identities and still effect people today.
Historical archaeology has been the subfield more concerned with questions of race in the past, due to its focus on modernity. Charles Orser (2001, 2004) is one such researcher who has devoted considerable effort to understanding how the concept of biological race has been understood and enculturated throughout history. He emphasized that while race may be a social construct, it is insufficient for archaeologists to focus on ethnicity as though the two concepts are equal, due in part to the continued existence of racialization. Racialization is understood as the act and process by which racial meaning is extended to a group of people, a social practice or relationship, or artifact type which were previously racially uncategorized (Omi and Winant 2014). The outcomes of this process are usually harmful to the racialized individual or group, and are perpetuated by those outside of that group, often those of the majority or otherwise dominant racial class (Gans 2016). Orser points out that even in the present day while other groups are seen ethnically, with their differences being attributed to culture, African Americans tend to be identified racially, their differences assumed to be biological. He advocated creolization as a model for archaeological study of cultures related to the African diaspora, in addition to a so-called mutualistic, or relational-determinative theoretical perspective that helps account for relationships between actors in the past.

African American disenfranchisement has become an important area of study within historical archaeology with the turn toward inequality and the people forgotten by history. Paul Shackel and David Larsen (2000) have focused on the dynamics of social relationships of African Americans and their relation to the changing cultural landscape. The authors advanced the available knowledge of the fluid and changeable social relationships in the town of Harpers Ferry and the South as a whole through an understanding of race in the context of labor and the built environment of an industrial community. Shackel and Larsen argued that African American workers, both slave and free, were universally disenfranchised but were either slightly empowered or further degraded based on the politics of the most powerful group in the system. By using a synthesis of historic documents to inform and explain certain archaeological interpretations, the authors created a cohesive model of social life at the industrial complex. This included constant structural violence done to African American workers in order to keep them subjugated to white workers through both laws and local regulations. These rules kept African Americans from working directly in the manufacture of firearms for the local armory, the highest paid work around, and also kept them from voting themselves into a position to work in the local factory system. As a result, these people had to find work in general labor and domestic services, or in largely unskilled labor positions and construction for the armory. One of the most notable examples of African American contributions to this system was that of a local stonemason who was hired by the government as a contractor, though he and his crew were often underpaid. These findings led to an affirmation of the fact that at any given moment the social status of African Americans was both completely in the hands of someone white and in power, and subject to their whims.

Other disciplines have provided useful insights that provide context for and broaden the scope of an archaeological study. In the field of history, Angelika Kruger-Kahloula (1994) has looked at structural inequality as it effects the mortuary realm. Her work discussed here involved segregation in cemeteries as a direct result of racial discrimination and oppression suffered by the deceased in life. In addition to providing numerous examples of cemetery segregation, Kruger-Kahloula included alternatives to concepts of structural violence as well as related case law from the nineteenth century up till the 1980s. She found that most segregation was not self-imposed, but also that self-segregation may occur without racial thinking being involved, for instance as a way to be buried with family or return to the community cemetery one has visited all one's life for community purposes. In addition to these findings, other sources suggested that segregation was so ingrained, only a complete change in the culture would stop the practice within cemeteries. While it has not always been the case, Kruger-Kahloula found that racism was the origin of structural violence, causing segregation within and between cemeteries, and becoming embedded in the culture even as overt racism lessened over time.

Richard Francaviglia (1971) has made contributions to the field of cultural geography which have theoretical implications for archaeological cemetery investigations. His work is concerned with the evolution of the cemetery as being representative of broader cultural changes. In one study Francaviglia’s objectives included description of how cemeteries vary spatially, the types of variability at a given moment, and how they have changed over time. Nine types of common monuments were identified within the five Oregon cemeteries surveyed, and these were charted statistically based on number and year to reveal evolution in taste. Layout of the cemeteries was also considered, being either less patterned, on a grid, or a sinuous road. The author found that all of these seem to correspond temporally to changes in the greater architectural styles of society. These changes matched the model of Pioneer, Victorian, Conservative, and Modern periods, while the pattern of expansion of cemeteries over time remained the same. Francaviglia found that the cemetery does change in predictable patterns over time, both in form and content, and this change reflects that present in the surrounding culture as well.

This has been only a small selection of the literature dealing with cemeteries as places both reflecting their surrounding culture, and blighted by the presence of structural violence and racial segregation. What follows is an application of Marxist philosophy to the historical phenomenon that was American racial segregation, which has been useful in understanding the effects of racism on community cemeteries in the South.
Applying Marxism to the Study of Racial Segregation

Change does not occur in a vacuum. “Everybody perseveres in its state of being at rest or of moving… except insofar as it is compelled to change its state by forces impressed” (Newton 1999 [1687]:416). So it is in society as well; social change only comes about through conflict between opposing views. Cultures tend to replicate themselves in opposition to those considered “other,” while at the same time existing as a synthesis of dialectically opposed subcultures dominating, resisting, and otherwise interacting with each other. In the words of Martin Luther King, Jr. (1963:4), “human progress never rolls in on wheels of inevitability. It comes through the tireless efforts and persistent work of men willing to be coworkers with God, and without this hard work time itself becomes an ally of the forces of social stagnation.”

If this study were only venturing to speak on the history of the South it would be necessary to adopt a theoretical viewpoint that accommodates the analysis of social conflict. The particular attention that is paid to the institution of racial segregation in northwest Florida makes the ability to speak directly of the elements of conflict even more important. For this reason, I have drawn on the theoretical and philosophical writings of Karl Marx and those who continued in his tradition, specifically their ideas related to social struggle and inequality. In The Communist Manifesto, Marx and Friedrich Engels (2002[1888]) describe the injustices of the capitalist ruling class committed on those who work under them and advocate for the abolishment of aspects of bourgeois culture and ideology in the hopes that such action might make all persons equal. Later, in Das Kapital, Marx (1990[1976]) implements his version of dialectics, consciously distinguishing it from Georg Hegel’s idealist conception which had served as his inspiration. I have found the Marxist concepts of dialectics and ideology helpful in understanding the relations inherent to racial segregation, and as such they are central to the study at hand.

Dialectics

The Hegelian dialectic as modified by Marx and Engels is a way of describing the reflexive nature of sociocultural relations, in which any given person, object, or institution is defined by its relation to any other. It denotes a dynamic social world being constantly remade, as any change in or conflict between parts alters the entirety of the system. As such, social reality is both made up and reconfigured by the contradictions between elements, with contradictions referring to the definitive relationships between social categories and their opposites. Every contradictory relation has an inherent negation capable of transforming that relation into a new synthesis of the two opposing categories. The process of this synthesis is referred to as the negation of the negation, and this only occurs when conflicts arise as a result of the relational contradiction. The new relation resultant from this process necessitates a change in the social world, and so the entire system is continually transformed (McGuire 1992). Put simply the dialectic begins in the relationship between thesis and antithesis and sublates the two into a synthesis; or in other words, the contradiction between an affirmation and its negation leads to the negation of the negation. The emphasis that Marx’s dialectics place on relationships is especially important to a Marxist archaeology, as it allows for objects to be viewed as relations themselves, not simply the product of action. Things and relations are bound together dialectically, one cannot exist without the other; thus objects are created by and expressive of the social relations that necessitate and define them (Ollman 1979).
One can also see the dialectic at work in the history of the Southern United States postbellum. The Civil War was effectively the surfacing of the contradiction in the relation between the Northern and Southern States, most notably over the issue of the continued legality of African American slavery. When the war ended with a Federal victory, the negation of the negation took the form of the legal hegemony of the US government in the South and the abolition of slavery. Simultaneously, this change in relation necessitated a change in the dialectic between Southern whites who wanted slavery to continue and the newly freed African American population. Due to the cultural hegemony of whites in the South, the synthesis of this relational contradiction was the abolition of slavery, but with freedom soon tempered by the institution of segregation, anti-miscegenation laws, and Jim Crow violence. However, Jim Crow Southern hegemony found its opposition in the Civil Rights movement, which eventually resulted in a further the negation of the negation, leading to equal protection under the law for African American citizens.

The dialectic applies to material culture in the way that people understand objects in their everyday lives, and the way that archaeologists understand them later on. Every artifact is a manifestation of a dialectical relationship between the practical, physical aspect of the object and the cultural, symbolic meanings that people attach to that object. For instance, the back door of a shop is functionally a secondary entrance, made up of a door, sill, jamb, handle or knob, lock, and so on. However, when one considers the rear entrance of a store in the context of American racial segregation, one comes to an understanding of that same door as a symbol of racial inequality, perhaps associated with other objects like signs reading ‘Black Entrance in Rear.’ The same dialectic exists within that historical context for the back seating section of a public bus, or the two separate water fountains on either side of the gym door at the middle school I attended in Lynn Haven.

Ideology

In Marxist philosophy, ideology is not a worldview as popularly conceived, but a constellation of beliefs that mystifies the relations between subjects in the real world, creating what has been termed a false consciousness. Ideology is a part of culture that comes about when subjects try to exercise power over each other without the use of coercive violence. As such, certain beliefs, practices, and other cultural aspects may or may not be ideological in the Marxian sense, depending on the context (McGuire 1992). In this study I have come to focus on the social representation of cemeteries by analyzing them in the context of the historical racial segregation in the United States. In a Marxist framework segregation can be viewed as a physical relationship between subjects derived from an ideology, that of racism. In this understanding of racism as an ideology, the idea of biological human races and the relational notion of hierarchical ranking are considered the sublime objects of ideology (Zizek 1989), in that it is through these concepts that this ideological structure of racism becomes commonplace and natural to each subject. To this point, historical research has shown that without a so-called scientific concept of human races, prejudice existed pre-Enlightenment in the form of xenophobia, but not as racism per se (Miles and Brown 2003).

I want to be very clear that I do not ascribe to a biological essentialist notion of race; quite the opposite. Race is understood as a social construct based in an outdated and morally contemptible view of skin color as scientific proof of the social, physical, and mental inferiority and superiority of various groups. I have come to think of human races as simulacra, conceptual copies of something that does not exist; an idea usually understood in opposition to a simulation, being a reproduction of something extant. More specifically each racial categorization is effectively a simulacrum of science, with science being the truth-process mimicked in their production (Baudrillard 1994). This is to say that the concept of races originated in the real idea of discreet biological races separating animal species, and continues to exist in relation to humans though there is no scientific evidence to support it. Unfortunately, the ideology of racism has been so pervasive in the Western world that despite a rejection of the biological reality of human races, the use of race as a “natural” method of categorization persists, as do the social effects of being perceived as one race or another, leading to positive or negative consequences based on the subject’s positioning in a racial in- or out-group.

In American history, the ideology of racism has a particularly invasive positioning as far as ideologies go. In practice, racism was used to naturalize the differences between subjects, proffering race as a biological explanation for perceived differences between racial groups, and in its capacity for stereotyping, was not limited to one aspect of life. As a result, the concept of race cast a shadow over every area of social life, including class relations. Interestingly, the Marxist tradition post-Marx has had a tendency to ignore matters of race in favor of class (Mills 2003), despite the words of its founders. Granted that Marx and Engels were products of their time, susceptible to the new findings of scientific racism, both acknowledged the necessity for the working class to integrate if it was ever to pose a threat to ruling class hegemony. Implied in their comments are the fractured nature of the working class, resulting in effectively two proletarian classes due to white racism, and the need to liberate the African American proletariat before the historical circumstances would be ripe for revolution (Nimtz 2003). Thus, the ideology of racism is revealed to be actively separating the working class, preventing revolutionary consciousness from coming about, bolstering the position of the bourgeois, capitalist ruling class, and naturalizing the dominance of both white classes over the African American proletariat. From this perspective, it becomes easy to understand segregation as a physical manifestation of the ideology of racism, resulting in alienation not only from the means of production but also from society at large.

Hegemony

The basics of class conflict in Marx’s economic theories were reworked and expounded upon by political theorists, sociologists, and anthropologists years later into a social science movement now referred to as neo-Marxism. Various writers adopted Marxist ideas and concepts and further developed them to in order to address social issues that Marx and Engels themselves did not. Hegemony is one of these ideas, with which political philosopher Antonio Gramsci essentially describes the consensual nature of the power dynamic between the ruling class and the working class (Eagleton 1991). Cultural hegemony takes the earlier conception of the capitalist class and conveys the idea that in addition to controlling the material means of production, this group is culturally dominant, exercising its collective agency over the population at large (Gramsci 1971). In a way similar to the concept of ideology, cultural hegemony describes culture as a sum of its parts, and insinuates that the daily practices that make up a subject’s social life work to normalize the power structure the subject lives within (Hoare and Sperber 2016). This is because of the way that ideology is used by powerful groups to legitimate their dominance and procure the consent that is necessary for hegemonic rule to exist. Subjects consent to hegemony because they have been socialized into the system and because this system allows the ruling class to look to the interests of the members of other classes, but only enough to secure those others’ loyalty in order to create a historical bloc (Gorman 1985; McGuire 1992; Bernbeck and McGuire 2011). The historical bloc may then continue to mystify the relations of its members to their own classes through ideological and other means, theoretically stabilizing social relations and making the prospect of revolution ever more remote (Larrain 1983).

Another way to understand hegemony is as the imposition of the “imagined world of the official mind” (Appadurai 1990:573), or the ideology of the powerful societal elite class, onto the lives and worldviews of other groups to the point at which the imagined world of the elite becomes the reality of the working class. Since the capitalist class controls production of the physical aspects of life, it follows that they effectively control the means of symbolic production, including systems of education, style, politics, socialization, and law (Comaroff and Comaroff 1991). By these means both culture and ideology are produced on a daily basis through everyday practices, and their control makes the ruling class socially dominant. Thus, hegemony occurs when the ruling class exercises their collective agency through civil society by the manipulation of culture, while it does the same through the state by way of direct domination. Social hegemony is enforced by the intellectuals of the dominant group, who use their prestigious place in society to reward people who consent to the dictates of the dominant group and punish dissenting groups through the coercive powers of the state (Gramsci 1971). According to this Gramscian strain of neo-Marxism, hegemonies are both structure and process and therefore the only way to be rid of a hegemonic system is to replace it with an alternate hegemony. Such an alternate system is referred to as a counter-hegemony, which usually consists of a collective of subjugated classes mobilized through a change in consciousness to actively dissent and replace the current system (Pratt 2004; Williams 2015). In this way, the counter-hegemony could be thought of as resistance incarnate, being effectively the revolutionary faction of the population. The Civil Rights movement of the 1960s was a non-violent resistance movement, which sought to replace the hegemonic state and its implicit white supremacy with a government more attentive to the needs and rights of its African American and other non-white citizens. Places and objects related to the movement have come to be recognized as important cultural sites, like the town of Selma, Alabama and the Edmund Pettus Bridge there, which served as the setting for important protest marches to Montgomery. Resistance can also be seen more subtly in an archaeological context in artifacts produced by slaves on plantations. These include colonoware ceramics and other pottery, small metal, fist-shaped talismans, and certain smoking pipes interpreted as attempts to promote African identity and social unity amongst the enslaved (Orser and Funari 2001).

From the first division of North from South in the 1760s by the survey of the Mason-Dixon line, the Southern United States has valued a culture of white, Protestant, heterosexual men. To this day, areas of the South considered not as concerned with these values are discounted as being liberal or Northern, especially if they are also more urban areas. This is especially true in Florida, where I grew up hearing the phrase “the farther south you go, the farther North you go” and several such derivatives. Similarly, the hegemony of the Reconstruction era and onward was the white ruling class, who set the cultural standards for every citizen of the South, whether they were white and of a lower class, or African American of any class. This is especially evident in the doll studies performed by psychologists Mamie and Kenneth Clark, presented as evidence during the landmark case Brown v. Board of Education (United States Reports 1954). The Clark’s research reveals the extent to which the societal disdain of people of color had been psychologically internalized by African American children attending segregated schools. The doll studies involved asking these children, between three to seven years old, to identify the perceived race of dolls of differing skin tones and to choose the one they preferred. The majority of the young children chose the white doll describing it in positive terms. In later a later study, by having children record their own perceived skin color as well as their theoretically preferred skin color, the Clarks found that by around the age of five, African American children were aware that to be non-white was to carry an inferior social status (Clark and Clark 1950). The racial hatred of the white hegemony in America was such that children, even under supposed physical distance from whites due to segregation, were still psychologically internalizing the ideology of racism. Thankfully this would not be so forever, as many influential African American figures had grown up in the same system and come to see through it, effectively forming a counter-hegemony known as the Civil Rights movement. With the help of professionals like the Clarks and legal changes like the Brown decision, over time the white hegemony would be weakened, and some might say ultimately replaced, though vestiges of the ideology of racism live on in our various institutions. From the state of politics today, I find it difficult to argue that the dialectical struggle between these two hegemonies has ended, even though the Civil Rights movement succeeded in its mission of resistance.

Structural Violence

Another major reason for this active opposition is explained by the term structural violence, introduced by sociologist Johan Galtung. Structural violence is effectively an alternate term for institutionalized social injustice that stresses the practical effects of prejudice on an individual or group. Within this term the word violence refers to a promotion of inequalities which may or may not be both intentional and conscious at the individual level, not necessarily to the imposition of physical damage. Essentially it is the wrong inflicted on subjected individuals and groups by the system of the hegemonic, ruling class by way of the modes of symbolic-cultural production previously discussed. Structural violence begins when inequality goes beyond the personal to become part of the social structure (Galtung 1969). Four specific types of structural violence include penetration, segmentation, marginalization, and fragmentation. These refer to the symbolic position of the ruling and subjugated groups in a society: the hegemonic being placed inside the oppressed, the hegemonic providing the oppressed only a partial view of society, the oppressed being kept on the fringes of society, and the oppressed being separated from each other, respectively. Each of these types serve to reinforce the structure by way of societal repression and exploitation (Galtung 1990).

Closely associated with this idea is cultural violence, which refers to the meaningful, symbolic aspects of society that perpetuate structural violence by rationalizing it. These may be entirely ideological or symbolic in nature, such as national flags and religious symbols, or primarily rhetorical or analytical, like political speeches and statistical data. Also called symbolic violence (Zizek 2008), cultural violence may render inequality morally acceptable or obscure it from view entirely, making it difficult to address or even to locate these systemic issues. These cultural aspects of violence make up one element in a trifecta of inequality, essentially feeding and mystifying the other elements; structural and direct violence. Cultural violence exists symbolically in the dialectical relations between things and people, while structural violence is a symbolic but nonetheless real process of repression and exploitation exhibited between an institution and people. Direct violence then, is the realm of visible social conflict between people, including attempts to use physical violence to reinforce, escape, or revise the oppressive structure (Galtung 1990). From an archaeological perspective, symbolic violence refers to material culture that is explicitly representative of an oppressive ideology, such as racism, sexism, and classism.

These expressions of violence may also be referred to as symbolic (cultural), systemic (structural), and subjective (direct) (Zizek 2008). When the ideology of racism moved from the individual, interpersonal sphere and became anchored in the social structure by way of its adoption into various social institutions, race-based discrimination became a form of systemic violence. Racial segregation, one of many physical expressions of racism in postbellum America, was a longstanding visible form of the social inequality which further served to normalize and legitimate that ideology, and vice versa. Due to the way segregation normalized both structural and direct, subjective violence against African Americans, it can be considered a form of symbolic, cultural violence. The institutionalization of racial segregation made it easier for racism to be socialized and allowed whites to harbor these racist beliefs longer, as there was less interaction with African Americans to help change these ideas. Simultaneously, the view of African Americans as “other” promoted and emphasized by their segregation allowed and, in some cases, encouraged violence to be done to them more openly, in direct, physical, and structural forms.

Making Use of a Landscape Perspective

There are many ways to approach the hypothesis that community cemeteries are culturally and demographically representative of their living communities. I have chosen to focus on the material remains of racial segregation due to its strong spatial component and historical ubiquity in my region of focus, the Florida Panhandle. Any academic study involving groups of people, alive or dead, necessarily involves some level of spatial analysis. Space is where archaeological sites are made and found, and it plays a crucial role in how they are interpreted. Racial segregation is necessarily spatial, being physical separation between social groups that played out on the landscape of nearly every town in the United States. In archaeology, landscape perspectives are concerned with both the conscious and the unconscious… processes of organizing space or altering the land for a particular purpose, be it religious, economic, social, political, cultural, or symbolic; with the unintended consequences of land use and alteration; with the role and symbolic content of landscape in its various contexts, including the collection of... history; and with the enactment and shaping of human behavior within the landscape [Metheny 1996:384].

Landscape archaeology has been described in various ways, but it tends to be a theoretical method for understanding, acknowledging, and representing the way people in the past affected the world around them, whether through physical manipulation, cognitive organization, or both, and the reciprocal effects that those places had on their communities. Landscape approaches essentially acknowledge the dialectical relationship between space and human beings. Such perspectives emphasize the idea that space and places are affected by the actions of people, social or otherwise, and also affect social action as the setting of its performance. Archaeological research conducted with a landscape approach focus primarily on spatial relationships and as such often speak to issues that involve the manipulation of space and creation of place, such as the exercise of power, allocation of resources, and class relations in the past (Branton 2009).

When used by landscape archaeologists, the term ‘landscape’ is practically used as shorthand for ‘cultural landscape’, bounded spaces defined by human cultural behavior along with the broader context of those spaces and behaviors (Branton 2009). Physical expanses of land hold little interest for most archaeologists beyond their contribution to the environmental context of a given site. Cultural landscapes however, while differing vastly in form, are comparable in function to any other piece of material culture. Landscapes in this sense have formal, historical, and relational dimensions that relate to their physical location and characteristics, the way the land and related society have changed over time, and the socio-symbolic interactions that connect people to that land, respectively (Zedeno et al. 1997).
This is why landscape archaeology is sometimes referred to as the ‘archaeology of place.’ In this context, ‘place’ refers to space that has cultural meaning attached to it through its interrelationship with people; places are “the outcome of the social process of (people) valuing space” (Preucel and Meskell 2004:215). Landscape then, can be conceived as an interconnected system of places that exist as both the setting and the record of social action inscribed on the land over time. Because archaeological sites are considered past places within the overarching socio-physical network, landscape can be seen as a scale of analysis spatially larger than the site that archaeologists may use to discuss and observe past social action across multiple places. It also acts as an interpretive framework that works well with social theory and spatial analysis, guiding it to an emphasis on the way people interacted with and experienced past landscapes, how this relationship caused culture to become part of the land, and the reflexive action of the landscape on the people and cultures engaging with it (Ashmore 2004; Branton 2009).

With its focus on the reflexive relations between past peoples and their physical surroundings, landscape archaeology emphasizes the importance of the space between places on the landscape and the cultural impact of each of these elements. Racial segregation existed as the physical separation of people and spatial separation of communities based on an understanding of difference that grew out of the ideology of racism. Some of the material traces of segregation can still viewed today without scrutiny, such as separate water fountains and building entrances in the central areas of town, African American church denominations, and barber shops, hair salons, corner grocery stores, and even post offices in historically African American neighborhoods. Other spatial remnants of racist structural violence are not as visible unless one is looking for them, like the continued habitation of predominately African American communities and the placement of municipal structures like police offices and jails in or near these cultural landscapes. A landscape approach can help to put these past spatial relations into perspective through analysis and mapping.

A Theoretical Synthesis

While Marxist perspectives are not implicated in the origins of landscape approaches, they emerged out of a European post-Hegelian, aesthetic understanding of landscape, and the reflexivity inherent to these views clearly reflects the influence of the Hegelian dialectic and its Marxian variant. Through this shared understanding of the reciprocal nature of relationships between the land, people, and their artifacts, we come to an understanding of how culture affected past societies and how ideologies come to have a lasting impact on our physical landscape in addition to our sociopolitical structures. Thus, the ideology of racism became a definitive aspect of American culture and politics and infected the landscape through the institution of segregation, which further served to legitimate the supposed ‘differences’ between African- and white Americans.

What landscape archaeology does in essence is recognize landscape as another expression of material culture, an artifact, one which is influenced by and recursively influences people, including their behavior and therefore the other artifacts that they create. This process causes the landscape itself to become an archeological record of social change over time (Branton 2009). By viewing the cemetery as an archaeological site made up of relatively fixed spatiotemporal grave-marking artifacts and focusing on a given social phenomenon, like segregation, it becomes possible not only to compare these cultural landscapes to each other, but also to the landscapes of the communities that produced them. In this way, I have adapted a landscape approach to the cemetery representation hypothesis. In order to determine whether the historical cemeteries of Bay County are representative of their community, this study must determine the effect of the ideology of racism on the landscape of its two oldest cemeteries, confirming or denying the presence of segregation therein. I will then compare the community landscapes of St. Andrews and Millville to the landscapes of the cemeteries they created, using race and segregation as my focal point.
Chapter 4:
Methods

In the previous chapter I discussed the implications of a combined Marxian-landscape archaeology, including the perspective such an approach can bring to a study of segregation. Using this theoretical framework my research recognizes cemeteries as built cultural landscapes, historical archaeological sites consisting of a collection of artifacts dialectically related to the land on which they are situated, the communities that surround them, and the people that put them there. These artifacts vary in form, from simple headstones to vaults and more intricate sculptural markers, but they retain those reflexive connections. Furthermore, a landscape approach tells us that these contextual relationships are not only defined by the space artifacts occupy, but by the space between them as well. All these features make for a useful framework for testing the hypothesis that community cemeteries are faithful representations of those communities both demographically and culturally. They also suggest certain methods for assessing such concepts, particularly when focusing on specific phenomena inherent to past culture, like racial segregation.

The explicit spatial relationship of racial segregation to the landscape and its historical prevalence makes it an ideal way to test the idea that cemeteries are representative reflections of their communities of origin. Extending this logic, historical municipal cemeteries would seem to be the best possible research subject when assessing the reality of population representation over time. Therefore, the key to testing the hypothesis and answering the research questions laid out in the first chapter is to determine whether or not Millville and Greenwood cemeteries, as the oldest extant municipal cemeteries in Panama City, were segregated in a way similar to the broader community, particularly in the period before 1908 prior to the dedication of the first African American cemetery. To carry out this testing, I first acquired and organized data on the cemeteries, including headstone inventories and maps. Next, I performed a surface survey to ground truth the cemetery data and create photo maps. Then I correlated the revised data from the headstones with historical documents that provided racial categories. Finally, I mapped the historical boundaries of segregation on the landscape and performed a spatial analysis of Millville and Greenwood cemeteries using the combined spatiotemporal-racial data through qualitative thematic mapping for comparison.

Data Acquisition and Organization

This process began with gathering information about Millville and Greenwood cemeteries, including the historical information presented in Chapter 2. Much of the history of Bay County is inaccessible in general Florida history books, so the work of local historians was essential in this endeavor, much of which I accessed through the Bay County Public Library’s local history room. While there had been no previous archaeological investigations of these particular cemeteries there have been several efforts over the years to survey them, resulting in two cemetery plot maps (Figures 6 & 7) and associated headstone inventories, created and compiled by Dan and Janet Steadham and available to the public through the Bay County Genealogical Society. These original inventories are reproduced in Appendices C & D, as HIPAA protections expire 50 years after death.

(OCR 2013) and 2009 legal proceedings ruled death records to be public information exempt from such legislation (RCFP 2009).

Once I had the grave marker inventories, it was necessary to organize the data in a useful way. The inventories are basically lists of each marked grave in these cemeteries, their respective inscribed information including names, dates, and epitaphs or relational data, and finally a section and plot code that denotes their position on the landscape by way of the aforementioned maps. According to federal (NHPA 1966) and state guidelines (State of Florida 1992) artifacts must be a minimum of 50 years old to be considered historical resources, so my study focuses on the headstones dated in and before the year 1966. I use the year 1966 because of its place in the history of the American fight against racial segregation and discrimination, being two years after the passing of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, one year before the Supreme Court struck down anti-miscegenation laws nationwide (United States Reports 1967), and because my research began in earnest in 2016, 50 years later. Between Millville and Greenwood cemeteries, this research accounts for 2,576 grave markers placed over a period of 93 years, from the year 1873 onward.

Another set of documents had a direct effect on my reorganization of the headstone inventories, namely the collection of plot deeds associated with Greenwood Cemetery (City of Panama City N.D.; Appendix I). St. Andrews Cemetery was acquired by Panama City in 1932 and the name of the cemetery was changed to Greenwood; these texts speak directly to the segregated nature of the cemetery through this transition and into modern times. The earliest deed in the collection dates to 1930, but in 1948 a duplicate was made of a deed originally issued in 1900 and in 1949 a deed was issued for a sale dating to 1922. They contain a clause requiring “that said property is to be used only for the purpose of the burial of members of the white or Caucasian race.” This clause remained in the Greenwood’s cemetery deeds under ownership of the city. government until at least 1985, after which there is a lack of deeds until the year 1994 at which point the requirement of whiteness had been removed. In this way we know that any internments in Greenwood Cemetery between at least 1922-1966 were of white citizens only, an example of what I refer to as “external segregation” (See Data Mapping section, this chapter).

Although it seems likely that such documentation existed at some point in history, I could not locate any such collection of deeds for Millville Cemetery. For this reason, the organization of the grave marker inventories took on different date ranges for the two municipal cemeteries. Thus, the modified Greenwood inventory included only headstones dated between 1882 and 1921, while the modified list of Millville grave markers accounted for the longer period of time, 1873-1966.

An important part of modifying the data involved ground truthing the information from the cemetery headstone inventories. In order to do this, I performed a surface survey of Millville and Greenwood cemeteries, walking the sections pertinent to this project while keeping an eye out for any inconsistencies between the grave markers on the landscape and the inventories and plot maps previously assembled. I also took photos of the cemeteries in the cardinal directions and created a cultural resource management-style photo map out of the plot maps in order to visually represent the landscape of the two cemeteries of interest.

After revising the headstone inventories into their most accurate, representative versions with regard to the goals of this research, I turned to the data recorded in various historical documents. Documents of all kinds have been used by historical archaeologists to guide research, shed light on the archaeological evidence, and aid in the contextual interpretation of sites (Wilkie 2006). In this case, in order to answer my research questions, I looked to transcriptions and scans of historical texts including records from the United States Federal Census, the Florida Death Index, and other sources such as the Florida Divorce Index, draft registration cards, funeral home and general land office records, war casualty lists, and the death records of various other states, all available for public access through Ancestry.com. By recognizing headstones not only as artifacts and “symbolic practice” (Shanks and Tilley 1987:101), but also as literal texts I was able to cross-reference the names, birth and death dates, and basic location (Bay and its surrounding counties) from the grave markers with state recognized racial data from the Census and other records.

Due to the aforementioned plot deeds for Greenwood Cemetery, I knew that the burials from 1922-1966 there were only of white citizens. This meant that I only needed to cross-reference records from 1882-1921, a period of almost 40 years that saw 136 interments in Greenwood. No such collection of deeds was available for Millville Cemetery, and in the 93 years from 1873-1966 there had been 834 burials. However, both Millville and Greenwood cemeteries are organized by family plot, meaning that if multiple headstones belong to the same plot, they are related. The Florida Constitution of 1885 codified racial segregation and also instituted anti-miscegenation law, preventing the legal marriage of any African American citizen to any white citizen. It follows that for burials of those born after 1866, 18 years before the Constitution of 1885 was ratified, if the cross-referencing process determines the race related to one headstone in a plot, then the other family members buried in that same plot would be of that same race due their relations. However, headstones related to those born before 1866, old enough to be married before the institution of anti-miscegenation law, would need to be checked individually to determine if there were any interracial marriages reflected in the cemeteries.
Data Mapping and Spatial Analysis

The process of cross-referencing the artifact-based texts and historical documents allows for a correlation to be made between race and headstones, and therefore also between race and the cemetery landscape. In this way, by mapping the results of the documentary work onto the modified plot maps, one can view the presence or absence of racial segregation in Millville and Greenwood cemeteries.

Theoretically, there can be three possible results when it comes to the representation of segregation on the landscape. These are internal segregation, no segregation, and external segregation. What I call internal segregation is what one would most likely think of at the mention of racial segregation in a cemetery; it implies shared space, such as a single cemetery with separate sections for people of different races to be buried in. In this case one would expect to find fairly discreet racial groupings of graves or plots on the landscape. An unsegregated or integrated cemetery would be just the opposite, like many modern cemeteries in which the location of burial is not based on any sociocultural norm, but simply left to the discretion of the customer or the deceased’s family. An unsegregated cemetery would therefore not exhibit any grouping of significance among racial populations, appearing somewhat randomly scattered in nature. Finally, there is what I refer to as external segregation, a form of segregation not always recognized as such after the fact due to the way it manifests. External segregation involves the complete separation of one race from another, implying the creation of two utterly separate places, much like the archetypical ‘sundown town.’ Most every town in the Southern United States was segregated internally, with white and African American neighborhoods sharing municipal space. But sundown towns, uncommon in the South, required any African American visitors to leave town by sundown, under threat of violence or worse (Loewe 2005). This is the spirit of external segregation, and it may be exhibited by a cemetery that limits usage of its grounds to only the deceased of one race, usually white. In such a cemetery there would be only one racial group represented across the entirety of the cemetery. But without knowing the surrounding context of the cemetery and its establishment, it may be difficult to determine whether such patterning was intentional or incidental.

In mapping out the racial distribution of the plots in Millville and Greenwood cemeteries, I expected to see a pattern fitting one of these three models, specifically that they would be either internally or externally segregated, given both the dialectical nature of the municipal cemetery and the segregation inherent in the Panama City area since its first settlement. Given the hypothesis that the cemeteries are culturally and demographically representative of their communities, I also prepared a map (Figure 8) representing the historical racial division of neighborhoods in St. Andrews, Panama City, and Millville and their corresponding cemeteries in order to more clearly visualize the manner in which segregation appeared culturally on the broader landscape. This was accomplished by consulting the local historical sources on the relative location of Millville’s African American community, inspecting the USGS topographical map to find the landform of the Hill in St. Andrews, and by locating Panama City historic neighborhood markers to delineate the boundaries of Glenwood. Based on this preliminary mapping it became clear that for Greenwood and Millville cemeteries to be truly culturally representative, they would have to spatially exhibit internal segregation.
Chapter 5:

Results

Data Organization and Field Survey

The process of reorganizing the data from the cemetery inventories basically amounted to creating two revised list of headstones in Millville and Greenwood cemeteries based on the research criteria discussed in the previous chapter. The modified inventory for Millville Cemetery (Appendix B) includes records for 834 headstones with death dates from 1873 and 1966. The reorganized data for Greenwood Cemetery (Appendix A) includes headstones dating from 1882-1921, or 136 grave markers. This makes for a total of 970 markers across the two cemeteries.

The surface survey I performed revealed a few inconsistencies in both the Millville and Greenwood cemetery inventories. Most of these were misspellings, easily attributable to the transcription process either from headstone to pen-and-paper notes, or from field notes to a word processing document. They could also be the result of spellcheck interference in the transcription from notes to electronic document, as some of the names inscribed on the headstones are not spelled as one may expect. I have corrected these issues in the modified headstone inventories and used these revised records to produce the cross-referenced data referenced below. There were also a few plot numbers on the Millville Cemetery map that were repeated incorrectly, namely plots 45 and 46 had been replaced by secondary occurrences of plots 42 and 41, on the south side of Section D, just east of center. I have rectified this on my modified maps seen later in this chapter.
Documentary Cross-Reference

In the interests of analyzing and change in the racial composition of these cemeteries from a basic statistical and mapping perspective, I split the data up into separate sections based on the particulars of each cemetery. Regarding Millville Cemetery, I reference the data in the periods 1873-1916 and 1873-1966, primarily because 1916 was the year that nearby Redwood Cemetery was established for the African American community. Given the information I learned from the plot deeds and discussed in the previous chapter, for Greenwood Cemetery I reference the data related to the periods 1882-1899, 1882-1921, and 1882-1966. This seems to me to be the best way to approach any visible grouping in the data and any change in that grouping over time.

In Millville Cemetery (Table 4), from 1873 to 1916 there were 82 interments, 65 (79.3%) of which I was able to identify through documents and relations as white, with the remaining 17 (20.7%) lacking any documentation regarding race. The following 50 years up to 1966 saw the total number of marked graves rise to 834, 786 (94.2%) of which belonged to white citizens, while the number of graves unable to be identified as to race increased to 48 (5.8%). Regarding Greenwood Cemetery (Table 3), from the years 1882 and 1899 there were 33 burials, 24 (72.7%) of whom were white, the other 9 (27.3%) unable to be identified as to race. When I expanded that time frame to 1921, the total burials increased to 136, with 125 (91.9%) white and 11 (8.1%) unidentified. During the years 1922-1966, it is known due to the cemetery plot deeds that only white people were allowed to purchase plots and bury in Greenwood. So, adding in those headstones brought the total number to 1,742, those same 11 (0.6%) unidentified along with 1,731 (99.4%) white graves.

Out of all the graves represented in Tables 3 & 4, none were associated with African American citizens. For the sake of analysis, I have arranged the numbers above into percentages, Table 3: Greenwood Cemetery Cross-Reference Results. Represents the individuals from my modified inventory of Greenwood Cemetery (Appendix A) organized by plot number, along with the type of evidence in the historical record for each and the race indicated by that evidence. Primary evidence consists of various historical documents such as Florida Death Index entries and U.S. Census data (compiled for each individual in Appendix G). Secondary evidence indicates the individual was related to another individual of determined race either in their family plot or elsewhere in the cemetery.

including the unidentified, but it seems important to recognize that as far as the cross-referencing of race and headstones in Millville and Greenwood cemeteries goes, 100% of those identifiable were white. Interestingly, even Joseph Givens, whose headstone in Millville Cemetery identifies him as a “Creek Indian,” was recorded as white in relevant census data. This may be because, beginning with the 1870 census, people of mixed Native American-white heritage were sometimes listed as white given that they lived with white people and participated in Euro-American society (Collins 2006). Using the plot locations, the headstones of white citizens and those lacking documentation of race were mapped onto the landscapes of these cemeteries.

Data Mapping and Spatial Analysis

While it may be the case that the only identifiable race present in these cemeteries was white, the headstones which could not be identified with a race retained an inherent potential to belong to citizens of any race, including African Americans. Through mapping I was able to elucidate the spatial relationship between ‘white’ grave markers and those not able to be similarly identified. As I pointed out in the previous chapter, if segregation were present on the landscape one would expect to see a certain grouping of graves or plots that is both separated from others and impermeable.

This is not visible in the locations of the graves of unidentified race in either Millville or Greenwood cemeteries. In Millville (Figures 9 & 10) these headstones are found throughout the cemetery, including Sections A, B, C, D, and G, not centralized or patterned in any discernible way, and interspersed among the plots of white families. The situation in Greenwood Cemetery (Figures 11, 12, & 13) is similar, and while Sections 7, 10, 11, 23, and 25 are much closer together relative to the unidentified plots in Millville, each of these sections are predominately white, and some of the plots in these sections include headstones associated with both white and racially unidentified citizens.

As mentioned previously, there are three possibilities when it comes to the racial segregation of cemeteries: internal segregation, no segregation, and external segregation. This study has shown that there is no sign of the grouping necessary to suggest internal segregation in Millville or Greenwood cemeteries. Between the spatial disorganization of the plots which lack grave markers with any racial documentary correlation, the seemingly free intermingling of white and unidentified plots, and the complete absence of any headstones associated with African American citizens in these cemeteries, it seems unlikely that these are examples of unsegregated cemeteries. It would be very surprising were the cemetery to be truly racially integrated and unsegregated in this area of Florida without any recognition as such, as unsegregated cemeteries were certainly not the cultural norm in the Panhandle, especially in the case of racially segregated communities.

This leaves what I consider to be the most likely option: that Millville and Greenwood cemeteries were externally segregated. This analysis seems to be supported by the conversation I had with the City of Panama City Cemetery Board member John Grant, who expressed the idea that the African American and white citizens of Bay County may not have buried together until recently (John Grant, personal communication 2016). The Greenwood Cemetery plot deeds (Appendix I) confirm this external segregation from the year 1922 to at least 1985, perhaps beginning even earlier circa 1900. While I was not able to locate any such collection of deeds related to Millville Cemetery, it seems likely that once the cemeteries were both under the ownership of the city government, the plot deeds would have been nearly identical, including the clause requiring the whiteness of the customer. This last insight is admittedly speculative but seems justified by both the bureaucratic nature of local government and the spatial data of Millville Cemetery (Figures 9 & 10).

With the realization that these cemeteries were externally segregated, I was able to revise the previous map (Figure 8) of the historically segregated areas of Panama City. By recognizing Millville and Greenwood cemeteries as historically whites-only cemeteries one can see that the Millville-Redwood and Greenwood-Hillside cemetery relationships mirror the past spatial relations between Oakland Cemetery and the Panama City Black Cemetery on the landscape (Figure 14). Specifically, one can see that the white cemeteries were placed on the edge of town, and the African American cemeteries were placed around half a mile to a mile north of the white cemeteries. Furthermore, the spatial relations of the white and African American cemeteries reflect the relationship between the location of the main area of each town, including white homesteads, and their African American neighborhoods. The Hill, Glenwood, and the African American community of Millville were all located north of their respective municipalities; the ‘white part of town’ was located on the waterfront property, whereas the African American neighborhoods were located inland toward the swampy wetland areas north of 15th Street. This meant that the white citizens of St. Andrews, Panama City, and Millville could travel from town to town along the coast, completely avoiding the African American neighborhoods unless they so chose. The spatial distribution of cemeteries also mimicked this quality: if a funeral was being held at an African American cemetery on the same day as a ceremony at one of the white burial grounds, the white families had a shorter length to travel and never had to pass by a black cemetery. The only exception to this rule was in St. Andrews, where Covington Cemetery was located on the edge of the Hill community on the way to Greenwood Cemetery, though this burial ground was in a mostly wooded area and was consequently less visible overall. The result of this external segregation of cemeteries was that the white families of Bay County did not have to interact with the grieving of African American families.
Table 4: Millville Cemetery Cross-Reference Results. Represents the individuals from the modified inventory of Millville Cemetery (Appendix B) organized by plot number, along with the type of evidence in the historical record for each and the race indicated by that evidence. As before, primary evidence consists of various historical documents (compiled in Appendix H). Secondary evidence indicates the individual was related to another individual of determined race either in their family plot or elsewhere in the cemetery.

Chapter 6:
Discussion and Conclusion

Discussion

This thesis has focused on racial segregation and its relation to the idea that cemeteries are representative of their communities. The evidence presented here suggests that the oldest community cemeteries in Panama City are not faithful representations of the phenomenon of segregation at the local level. Additionally, these cemeteries do not represent the broader community demographically, as they are only representative of the white population of the Panama City area. The results suggest that there was no public burial ground for the African American citizens of this area of Bay County until 1908, and they were apparently excluded from burial in the existing municipal cemeteries altogether, at least until the 1980s in the case of Greenwood. Unfortunately, it remains uncertain where the African American community of this area buried their dead before their public cemeteries were established in the early twentieth century. Some have suggested that the Gainer Cemetery, about 20 miles north of Panama City near the Econfina, may have been used by the community following its use as a slave cemetery (Timo 2013). The Lynn Haven Community Cemetery was an option around seven miles to the north, but was only created in the late 1800s. Similarly, there was the graveyard of New Judson Missionary Baptist Church that the Massalinas and others built on Redfish Point, but this only predated the Panama City Black Cemetery by a few years (Burch 2020; Womack 2001). Since New Judson and St. James, the earliest churches in the area, date to 1899 and 1900 respectively, it seems most likely that for many decades burials occurred on private homesteads and were gradually lost to time, the elements, and development much like Covington Cemetery.

This brings to attention an odd feature of the racial segregation inherent in the mortuary history of Panama City. Clearly Greenwood and Millville cemeteries do not reflect the presence of segregation internally, as one would expect given the way the phenomenon played out on the local landscape, but they are still segregated. These places simply represent the segregation of the community externally, initially through complete exclusion from public burial grounds, and later through the use of separate cemeteries. We know this to be an unfaithful representation of the population of the region, and the phenomenon as it manifested in society, as there have been African American inhabitants of this region just as long as there have been white settlers and they have always interacted. What deeper meaning does this untruth reveal?

When, following Dethlefsen, I hypothesized that cemeteries are culturally and demographically representative of their communities, my specification that these places further reflect the social realities of their populations, effectively posited that cemeteries are dialectically expressive of ideologies. One of the ideologies expressed in these cemeteries was the ideology of racism exhibited through segregation, albeit in an unexpected form. It is the implication of this form of external or complete segregation, including and not limited to the effective erasure of the African American community in cemeteries, that bears further scrutiny. A municipal cemetery populated exclusively by whites projects an image of an all-white town. Were all local histories lost and all African American cemeteries forgotten, the entire Panama City area would appear to have been a sunset town.

One might say that a sunset town expresses the same ideology of racism as a segregated town, but with a greater degree of intensity. A sunset, or sundown, town is an example of racist ideology par excellence in that the concepts of race and white supremacy were so totally embraced by the town’s white population that it became the dominant ideology. This was affected by complete removal of African American citizens from the area, theoretically removing anyone resistant to the implementation of such an ideology of racism. We know from the local history that this was not the case with Millville, St. Andrews, or Panama City. In 1918 the local St. Andrews newspaper even praised the local African American community (Womack 2008), and black labor was important to Bay County’s mill industry well before Millville became the largest town in 1920.

By only allowing for the burial of white people in St. Andrews (Greenwood) Cemetery and Millville Cemetery, the local governments symbolically linked municipal citizenship with whiteness. Along with all of the other experiences of being a person of color in a predominately white Southern town, to be African American in Panama City meant that there was no place for you in a public cemetery, at least until there were public burial grounds set up for people of color. In this way, cemetery segregation normalized the societal phenomenon, reinforcing the false consciousness of the ideology of racism and its many consequences. In addition to this, it spatially distanced the white citizens from the death and grief of their African American neighbors, further limiting the two groups’ shared experiences.

At the end of this discussion, I return to the research questions I set out previously. Using headstones as both artifact and text related to historical documents, I found that Millville and Greenwood cemeteries do exhibit racial segregation. This phenomenon manifested on the landscape of the cemetery by way of external segregation, allowing only white people to purchase plots and bury in the municipal grounds. Qualitatively, external segregation corresponds more to a sundown town with only white citizens, where the societal norms of historical Bay County would be better represented by internal segregation. The cemeteries do not mirror or model the way racial segregation manifested on the landscape internally, but the spatial relationship between the later African American cemeteries and the white cemeteries is strikingly similar to that between their respective communities. Based on all this, I must conclude that Millville and Greenwood cemeteries are not representative of the people that made up the municipalities they were named for, and were not representative of the local manifestation of the sociocultural phenomenon of racial segregation, at least until African American cemeteries were established.

What can be viewed on the landscape of these cemeteries and their past communities is the effect of the ideology of racism on the structure, not the community itself. This is to say that these places are representative of the historical municipal government and the racial categorization of those that ran it, those in power, rather than the broader populations of these towns. Community cemeteries in northwest Florida towns like Magnolia Cemetery in Apalachicola, the Florida State Hospital Cemetery in Chattahoochee, and Tallahassee’s own Greenwood and Old City cemeteries serve as examples of internal, or intra-cemetery segregation, presumably offering a more representative picture of their respective populations. The local government’s ownership and management of Millville and Greenwood cemeteries makes them a prime example of race-based structural violence and cultural hegemony at the municipal level. There were no state laws regarding segregation in cemeteries, so when Panama City officially limited burial within Greenwood Cemetery the local government symbolically erased the African American community and prevented them from public burial in St. Andrews for over a decade.
Implications for Previous Research

The only example of an archaeological study I found that directly references a cemetery I covered in this thesis is a relatively recent master’s thesis entitled “Back Home to Econfina”: Maintenance of African American Memory and Landscape at the Gainer Historical Cemetery (Timo 2013). The study makes specific mention of Hillside, Redwood, and Millville Cemeteries, referencing their features to those found at the Gainer Cemetery, historic resting place of many members of the African American Gainer family. However there seems to be a misunderstanding, as Millville Cemetery is referred to as predominately African American, and one of its wooden discoid grave markers (Figures 15 & 16) seems to be used as evidence to support this idea. But as I have shown in this research, it appears that Millville Cemetery is predominately, if not exclusively, a white cemetery. Between the 1870s and 1966, 786 out of 834 (94.2%) total marked burials marked the graves of white citizens. Given that this study does not include the few unmarked or unrecorded graves therein, that leaves only 45 graves remaining unidentifiable with regard to race, accounting for about 5.4% of the total number of burials covered. Combining this with the fact that their placement on the landscape of the cemetery reflects no pattern or grouping of any kind with regard to each other or the white graves, it appears increasingly unlikely that the unidentifiable graves belong to African American citizens. Adding to this, the aforementioned wooden discoid-type marker is not exclusively found in African American cemeteries. Wooden grave markers were very common historically for people of lesser financial means, and where some have noted their similarity to African grave markers (Stokes 1991), other have seen a pattern of discoid markers arriving in the United States with European immigrants (McNerney 2017). At the very least I believe it can be said that Millville Cemetery was a predominately white burial ground.

Future Research

There are techniques that I would have liked to implement in this study that could be done by someone undertaking similar research in the future. Going forward, it would be beneficial to have use of a total station, to be able to take highly accurate geographical data points for each headstone and use them to create a searchable geographical information systems map and associated database of any given cemetery. The methodology of this thesis is such that one could undertake similar work anywhere, theoretically with much older cemeteries and many different types of historical documents.

One could integrate this analysis of the racial distribution of cemeteries with other analyses such as those performed by Dethlefsen (1981), of headstone materials used, of the shapes of markers, of the frequencies of epitaphs and kinship terminology, of family groupings and paired versus single burials, of military service, and of religious and cultural content inscribed in stone. While many times overlooked by archaeologists, headstones are a unique type of artifact that is inherently and explicitly symbolic and textual, present many opportunities for analysis that other artifact types may be too utilitarian in nature to undergo fruitfully.

Other projects that could take place here include ground penetrating radar (GPR) survey of the older sections of Millville Cemetery, rumored to have been the place of many unmarked graves of deceased mill workers and the burial place of limbs severed while on the job. It would certainly be interesting to see the results of a GPR survey of the former site of the Panama City Black Cemetery, though the marked graves were moved it is possible that many unmarked graves remain under the back lot of the Goodyear tire shop.

Conclusion

Given the results of this thesis, it is difficult to make a definitive statement as to the representative nature of the community cemetery. Where burial grounds may reflect their surrounding community in some respects, it may not in others. They may even represent ideologies or groups that we are not expecting or looking for based on our research questions, or represent what we would expect to see in a manner we could not predict. This is what I see as the failure of this idea of cemetery-as-model as put forward by Edwin Dethlefsen (1981): where it seems a logical and, for the most part, safe assumption to make that community cemeteries are representative of their living populations through time, it implies a universality of structure in that the statement itself covers over any possible variance or change over time resulting from the historical forces that worked to produce these built landscapes.
In this way by trying to represent the people of the past as three dimensional, sympathetic, and symbolically minded beings, such a generalization overlooks the fact that historical subjects were people in every way, with agency and agendas of their own, susceptible to various ideologies and worldviews and liable to express them in any number of ways. An understanding of the history and cultural context of the groups that produced cemeteries is necessary on a community-by-community basis to truly come to an understanding of the representative qualities of the public cemetery. I recognize that the differences in thought and understanding on this point, along with the desire to create general rules of culture, clearly mirror the contrast between neoevolutionary approaches in archaeology and the kind of post-processual, Marxian-landscape theory applied in this research.

In this study I have focused on the ideology of racism as expressed through the structural violence and cultural hegemony of racial segregation. Through this research it has become clear that Greenwood and Millville cemeteries are not representative of the communities that surround them in and of themselves. The municipalities from which these burial grounds received their names have always been more diverse than the populations of the deceased researched here. It appears that these cemeteries only house decedents of the white community of Bay County, which completely separated itself in death from the long-standing local African American community. I have presented this reflection of social phenomenon as a kind of external, inter-cemetery segregation, existing as a form of structural violence spanning the landscape, as opposed to intra-cemetery segregation, in which the social injustice is portrayed within the burial ground. While I briefly addressed such matters in Chapter 3, the ‘why’ of segregation is not the focus of this research and may be better addressed by other scholars of history, social psychology, and critical race theory. However, as Marx said on the subject of white supremacy, “to such people it is always a source of satisfaction to have somebody they think themselves entitled to mepriser [despise]” (Nimtz 2003:160).

Appendix I: Greenwood Cemetery Plot Deeds

Appendix J: Permissions

Mr. Putman,

Yes, you have our permission to use this information for your thesis with copyright marks intact. Good luck with your continued education.

Hello Steadhams,

Ethan Putman here! It’s been a long time since I last emailed, and I wanted to let you know that I’ve been using your cemetery maps and inventories for Millville and Greenwood Cemeteries to great effect.
I wanted to make sure that I have your permission to include/publish them in my graduate thesis, with your copyright marks intact of course. They have been invaluable, and are the linchpin of my research on Bay County!

Sincerely and with many thanks,

Ethan Putman

Hi Ethan,

Our copyright notice is to protect the original submitters from having their files “hijacked” to other sites. You are welcome at anytime to use those files for “personal research”. However, you can always contact the contributors, in this case the Steadhams for permission to use their work. In this case you have already obtained permission from them so you have nothing to worry about from our standpoint. Very good of you to have contacted them directly first, so thanks for that and good luck with your thesis.
Debra Crosby

Subject: Millville Cemetery

Dear Ms. Crosby,
My name is Ethan Putman, I am a graduate student at the University of South Florida. I am working on a thesis involving two cemeteries in Bay County, one of which is Millville Cemetery. I have found the inventory housed in your archives invaluable to my research and obtained permission from the original creators, the Steadhams, for its use in my thesis. However per the notice included with the inventory, I wanted to make sure that I do not require any further permissions, or that there are no rules regarding its use and reproduction in the appendices of my thesis. Any help or answers you could provide me in this regard would be greatly appreciated.
Thank you for your time,
Ethan P.
