Hello all,

Free to a good library home,

Approximately 70 Mount Vernon Genealogical Society newsletters from 2002 to 2012.
Not a complete run - many scattered issues missing.

Please reply off list and include your library?s postal mailing address. Thanks.

Greetings to all;

Just when I got rid of the last of the yearbooks, more were dropped off when I wasn't around. They are from out of town and I can't use them here but am listing for anyone interested. I will mail these out on my own to anyone who can use them, if your library can reimburse me (as opposed to the library). I will gladly scan a copy of the receipt for anyone who needs it.

Please reply off-list.

Thanks!

Michael,
I think you answered your own question. But to elaborate:

Ancestry has online (1) the major ports and (2) many other published (by NARA) immigration microfilm publications as well as (3) many more immigration microfilm publications that have been released digitally only through Ancestry as NARA?s partner.

FamilySearch has online (1) the major ports and (2) the alphabetical or soundex indexes thereto (a good thing in case either site?s indexing of the original lists is not accurate in individual cases), and (3) some of the other published (by NARA) immigration microfilm publications.

Does that help?

Hi Everyone,

I have a genealogist who wants to take the information that was compiled by a genealogist who is now deceased to make new print and digital books to preserve the information. The books and materials that he is hoping to use is in loose-leaf binder form as well as compiled in vertical files. As this information was not published, does anyone know if copyright law would apply to the material? I have done a bit of research, but I have not come up with a definitive answer.

Thanks in advance,
Kelsey

Kelsey,

This may answer come of your questions and raise others.

The same copy right would apply whether or not the information was "published."

There might be some different regulations depending on when the information was compiled. If since 1989 no formal registration with the Copyright Office is required and no notice of copyright must be listed. It is covered by copyright from the moment it is recorded in tangible form.

If the material is covered by copyright, I don't know how hard it would be to find who might have inherited this intellectual property. I would expect that most surviving family members would be happy to give permission for the information to be preserved but you never know until you ask.

The vertical file material may also be covered by copyright. That could be more problematic because multiple authors could be involved.

The following may not cover an independent author but would cover what librarians are permitted to do: http://copyright.gov/circs/circ21.pdf

Hi Everyone,

We have a small list of books and pamphlets for trade. The list is attached.

We have additional surplus items, available for sale, that we would also consider trading. The list may be viewed at http://www.gfo.org/library/surplus.pdf

And we have publications, also available for sale, that we would be happy to trade. They can be seen at http://gfostore.yolasite.com/

Please respond to me directly at president at gfo.org with lists or links to any items you have to trade.

CALL FOR PAPERS

Popular Culture Association/American Culture Association

Genealogy and Popular Culture Area

The Popular Culture Association/American Culture Association annual conference will be held March 21-25, 2016, at the Sheraton Hotel in downtown Seattle. Scholars from a wide variety of disciplines will meet to share their Popular Culture research and interests.

Interested scholars are invited to submit papers for this year?s new ?Special Topic Area,? Genealogy. Academics studying and writing on American popular culture might examine genealogy within the context of television and literary disciplines, library and archival disciplines, American and public history disciplines, museum studies, or folklore. Proposals for papers or panel presentations regarding any aspect of these or other connections would be welcome.
Possible themes for papers/panels include but are not restricted to:
??? ?DNA in genealogy
??? ?Comparison of different genealogy television programs
??? ?Comparison of US genealogy television programs with British or Canadian programs
??? ?Study of the motivations for researching family history
??? ?Religious aspect of family history (e.g., LDS church)
??? ?The monetary impact of the business of genealogy
??? ?Redefining genealogy: from elitist pursuit to the Roots phenomenon
??? ?Fiction or non-fiction: when genealogists write the family story
??? ?Genealogy in mystery novels
??? ?The fate of the FitzRoys and Royal Bastards if DNA had been discovered in 1100
AD
??? ?Serendipity in genealogy
??? ?Comparing ?traditional? research methods with ?Internet Genealogy?
??? ?Ethnic studies in genealogy
??? ?Ephemera as family history evidence
??? ?Victorian obituaries and death stories
??? ?The relationship between genealogy and history or law or medicine

Please submit a 100 to 250 word abstract on your proposed topic to the PCA website as described here: http://pcaaca.org/national-conference/proposing-a-presentation-at-the-conference/.

All Proposals & Abstracts Must Be Submitted Through?The PCA Database
The deadline for submission is October 1.

Potential participants do not need to be members to submit proposals; however, membership in PCA/ACA and registration for the conference are required in order to present.

Please send all inquiries to:
Bruce E. Drushel, Ph.D.
VP Programming & Area Chairs, PCA/ACA
drushebe at miamioh.edu

For more information see the associations' website at: http://pcaaca.org/national-conference

Note from Beth Stahr: I proposed this new section, and the ?special topics?
designation was allowed on a trial basis. While Dr. Drushel is the official chair for the subject area, I am assisting as unofficial chair this year, and I?d be happy to answer any questions you might have about the conference, submissions, topics. This is a fun conference, located in a great city this year---send your proposals!

Greetings,

I have been asked to submit some ideas for Librarians' Day sessions at an upcoming genealogy conference. While I attend and present at genealogy conferences, I have never participated in the Librarians' Day sessions. Looking at the programs from past FGS, NGS, and NERGC conferences, their Librarians' Day events seem tailored towards librarians who are already familiar with basic genealogy sources, tools, and topics.

I am hoping some of you are willing to provide feedback that will help me develop some program ideas.

Q1) Have you attended a Librarians' Day event at a genealogy conference, and if so, what were your thoughts? Helpful, too basic, too advanced, not relevant enough, etc.?

Q2) What sort of presentation and/or hands-on workshop topics would you find useful as a professional development/continuing ed programming to help you better serve genealogy patrons?

Thank you for your time.

Colleen,

I have attended a number of Librarian's Days. The content has varied. One year it was all panels by various librarians on topics of interest - as an example I pariticipated on a collection development panel from the point of view of an academic librarian balancing genealogical purchases against curricular support purchases. At several others, the presenters have been representatives of major genealogical resources such as Ancestry. I would suggest that most programming be aimed at advanced researchers.   In terms of topics, I would be interested in learning more about resources for difficult research areas such as Quaker research.

Colleen,
	I agree with Karen. There are always some areas of ethnic genealogy that are beyond the basics that I have managed to locate in books, articles, on the web and talking to other genealogists. With much of the Freedman's Bureau nonbank materials being release and digitized I would find that a marvelous series of lectures. I also have heard of several courthouses making it difficult, if not impossible, for genealogists to access what would normally be open records. Any lecture that would include the names of those courthouses/counties/states and suggest ways my patrons could work to have those courthouses available for all to use would be very nice. Quaker research outside of the published books is a good idea as is how to research in the denominations that keep very few records. I would personally love to attend a lecture on Jewish immigrants and tracking their changes of name after their names were placed on the ship manifest. I know one family that was named something like "Putluck." One member of the family came into New York using the surname of "Pete" and another the surname as "Goldberg." I would like to find the point at which the surname was actually changed so it can be documented.

    All that being said I am in Texas and any chance of my going to a conference out of state is very slim so, please, make the courses and their handouts available on CD!

Hello!

My department is in the process of restructuring and (hooray!--finally) adding new positions. We are a mid-sized genealogy and local history collection with a growing archival collection, nested within a regional public library system.

If your institution/department is of a similar size or structure, I would be grateful if you would share your organizational chart with me off-list at astanley at athenslibrary.org.

A patron has come across this as an industry in the 1940 census:
"Tabulation Project 5021." The occupation is some kind of clerk--looks sort of like "seaman," but I think possibly "senior," especially since this is in Council Bluffs, Iowa.

I am not finding anything about "Project 5021." I'm wondering if it is related to the WPA, since there are other people in the neighborhood working for the WPA, or in some cases on something like "rock quarry project."

Has anyone come across this, or have an idea where I could look it up?

Thanks!

The 1940 Census was "keypunched" for those of us old enough to remember 80 col. cards or 96 col cards. There were various codes tabulated for the Census Bureau. I use this web site http://www.stevemorse.org/census/mcodes1940.htm to get an idea of the codes. If one looks at the original schedules you can see the columns that were coded.

Remember when the Japanese were interred during World War II the Census was used to locate them. If I remember my WWII History Class correctly, the same method was used to locate German Nationals.

Good luck -

Hello all,

I have two books available for a library that can use them:

1)   The Argyle Patent and Accompanying Documents (Washington County, NY) by Jennie M. Patten

2)   The First Census of Texas 1829-1836 by Marion Day Mullins

Both are 60-some pages and paper bound, but in really good shape since they've been sitting in a file cabinet for years.

Please email me off list if you would like either of these.

Thanks very much! The patron and I are thinking that a likely hypothesis is that his ancestor was working on a WPA project, especially since one of the codes indicates he did "public emergency work."

I have volunteered at an FHC for almost 30 years, and many things have changed there.

Lately one of the most often asked questions by users, is how to"gang-ignore" hints on Ancestry. Some folks have thousands of people in their online trees, and looking at scores of pages of hints (which sometimes are of no use) seems to be very time consuming. Does anyone know of a way to scan the list of hints and dismiss a page at a time instead of one by one?

Introducing Hint Notifications and Preferences
Posted by Aaron Orr on May 3, 2012 in Ancestry.com Site

Ever wonder if there are new hints you haven?t seen hiding in your family tree? Now it?s easy to see new hints when they come your way?we?ve just released a feature to notify you when you get new hints. You may have noticed when you last visited Ancestry.com that the menu bar in the top-right corner of the site looks different. In addition to a new design, there?s now a leaf; a red number will appear on the leaf when you have new hints waiting for you.

>From anywhere on the site you can click on the leaf in the menu bar to see a list of your new hints and review them right then or come back to them later. Clicking on an individual hint will take you to the Person Hint List to review hints for that person, and clicking on ?See all recent hints? takes you to the All Hints Page to review all hints in your tree, which are listed by the most recent.
If you have several trees, but are only active on some of them, you can also set your preferences so you?re only notified about hints in the trees you?re actively working on. Hint Preferences are located on the Site Preferences page ? just click on Site Preferences from the drop down menu under your username.

Additionally, we?ve heard from some members that they are less interested in hints to other member trees than other hints, such as record hints. We want to make sure that this new feature, as well as Ancestry Hints in general, is useful to everyone. Now in Hint Preferences (found in Site Preferences) you can choose whether to display your Member Tree hints or not. This setting can remove Member Tree hints from the tree viewer, hint notifications, hint lists, hint counts, etc. Member Tree hints are still accessible, however they?ll only be found in the Member Tree view on the All Hints page (it will say ?OFF?, but you can still click to see any Member Tree hints you may have). If you turn Member Tree hints back on they?ll reappear throughout the site.

We hope that these new features will help you to get the most from the hints in your family tree and make more meaningful discoveries. Let us know what you think. As you use this new feature, please take this survey to share your thoughts with us.

I have volunteered at an FHC for almost 30 years, and many things have changed there.

Lately one of the most often asked questions by users, is how to"gang-ignore" hints on Ancestry. Some folks have thousands of people in their online trees, and looking at scores of pages of hints (which sometimes are of no use) seems to be very time consuming. Does anyone know of a way to scan the list of hints and dismiss a page at a time instead of one by one?

Hi, Kelsey-

Generally, if this was an unpublished work, the copyright is good for 70 years after the author's death. If you don't know when the author died, copyright is good for 120 years after a work's creation. Here's an easy chart from Cornell University: http://copyright.cornell.edu/resources/publicdomain.cfm

We bought microfilm copies of a local newspaper last year. I knew the publisher was deceased, so I had to track down his son to get permission for our state library to make copies of the microfilm for us.

Yours, Kathy

Hello,
Our library has noticed a decline in the amount of genealogy ILL requests we receive. Two years ago it used to be monthly, sometimes weekly, and now it is once every 5-6 months.

We find this odd. How goes it with you?

Interesting. Maybe patrons are finding more of what they need online? Our books don't circulate at all and at least in the past 4 yrs since I've been in this position we haven't had too many Xerox requests. I don't know what it was like before that.

I'm just curious if anyone has noticed an increase in patrons who are more impatient or come in with unrealistic expectations of what we can do for them since
TV shows like Who Do You Think You Are, Genealogy Roadshow, and Finding Your Roots with Henry Louis Gates (as well as those ubiquitous Ancestry.com "leaf" commercials) have become more popular in the last few years.

What steps have you taken to temper these kinds of expectations when you're doing an initial reference interview?

I'd be interested to hear any specific "horror" stories you might have. I have been thinking about it since the new season of WDYTYA began last Sunday and I thought I'd ask the group for its thoughts.

I work as an archivist at a non profit, and don't see too many genealogists in here. However, I do professional genealogical research on the side with genealogists.com. I have encountered some clients that are quite determined to prove descent from a prestigious person or family, even when the evidence obviously points in a different direction. Some people have even gone to lengths to withhold evidence in their initial research request to steer me towards a conclusion that I unveil as false. I don't know if this is yet another symptom of the "Who Do You Think You Are" effect, but it seems that some people have expectations that the research will prove famous connections, and then are disappointed when they realize their ancestors were ordinary people of their times. I personally find it all fascinating, and I wish these people would appreciate their ancestors regardless of whether they were wealthy or not. Its a piece of history to own, not a piece of fame to be entitled to, in my view.

I'm just curious if anyone has noticed an increase in patrons who are more impatient or come in with unrealistic expectations of what we can do for them since
TV shows like Who Do You Think You Are, Genealogy Roadshow, and Finding Your Roots
with Henry Louis Gates (as well as those ubiquitous Ancestry.com "leaf" commercials) have become more popular in the last few years.

What steps have you taken to temper these kinds of expectations when you're doing

an initial reference interview?

I'd be interested to hear any specific "horror" stories you might have. I have been thinking about it since the new season of WDYTYA began last Sunday and I thought I'd ask the group for its thoughts.

If someone comes in with unrealistic expectations I take the opportunity to gently educate them. I find a friendly way of making sure they understand that those shows have many staff people around the county (and world) working non-stop on a case for months leading up to the airing of the episode. I usually use the analogy of the kitchen remodeling shows - you wouldn't expect you entire kitchen to be gutted and remodeled in 30 minutes would you? ;-)

After the education process, I help them get started on their genealogical journey and they usually are very excited and appreciative.

No "horror" stories here and I am a dedicate genealogical specialist for our library system.

We have not had any more people with unrealistic expectations after these programs debuted than we had before them. I worry more about the many times they fly the person to a library, church or archive to look at original documents, when those same documents can be found online, on microfilm, transcribed in book form, and/or can be researched and copied for a reasonable fee by the institution's staff or local researchers for hire. Sure, it's thrilling to see and touch documents that your ancestor did, or that were at least in the ancestor's presence, but it is not necessary to obtain the information and/or an image.

We are used to people with unrealistic expectations, mostly those who want to research Native American ancestry. Because they know little or nothing about the history of Native Americans in this part of the country in general, and in West Virginia in particular (even those who grew up here, sad to say), they are unaware that there are no federal or state-recognized tribes here, that there are no true reservations here, and there are no official "lists" of Native Americans compiled in any time period. No vital records or census records (except a few instances in the 1910 U.S. Census) identify a person as Native American. It was not to one's advantage to be identified as Native American at a time when indigenous people were being driven out of the area.

Of course, the most disappointed people are the ones who ask us for a copy of the family history done by a relative who "won't share it." They think we have a copy of the research readily available, and are not willing to do the work themselves. Even if we happen to have a printed copy, we can't make them a photocopy due to copyright.

We try to diplomatically bring everyone to the same starting point. No matter what their expectations, everyone has to start with themselves and their parents and work backward, carefully collecting all documents and information they can find for each generation. Most are happy just to find "their people," whether they were farmers or someone "famous."

I keep a copy of that iceberg graphic prominently displayed in our genealogy room - the one that says digital resources are just the tip of the iceberg, and 90% of the real work still has to be done by visiting courthouses, archives, libraries and historical societies. I like to point to it when I explain to patrons that as wonderful as digital resources are, they still only represent a fraction of the historical material that's out there to be mined, and a serious search is going to involve rolling up one's sleeves and getting one's fingers dusty.

I can't stand to watch the shows just because of the people it brings in. Yes, I get a lot of, my name is Smith, where's the book with my family history in it.

I explain to them that while a few records are by surname, most are by location and time period. I try to work out what information they are really trying to find and then go from there. I often get comments about how family history is hard work.

My library has a user fee so some walk away. But for those who are willing to put in a bit of effort we really try to help them.

All,
  I do not see this as a new trait but an old idea being recycled. I remember a long ago issue in a popular magazine that suggested purchasing photographs at an antique store as "instant ancestors". I suspect there will always be "headhunters" who are only looking for easy research and those wanting famous ancestors. U have only had a few who wanted to start their research with an important ancestor and work to the present but they have been determined to do it their way. Sigh.

I find that the majority of people I assist are indeed newbies to genealogy research and have seen at least one of these shows, but I haven't run into too many with unrealistic expectations. I am an academic librarian who teaches genealogy research to mostly college age students. They usually are acquainted with how the research process works in general. I'm really glad these shows are on TV, because it has inspired people to ask questions about their heritage. I have to say that I wish they would show some "behind the scenes" footage so people can appreciate the work that goes on to find the records. My husband and I were part of the crew for Genealogy Roadshow - Philadelphia. We had a blast working with everyone.

Most, but not all of the people I work with are newbies too. Some have watched the shows, and some have no idea of the time it takes. Whether or not this is due to the shows, I can't say. If they come into the genealogy room asking, I usually joke and tell them that "we can't trace your family back to the Mayflower in 10 minutes, but we can start and see where the search leads us."

Most people are fine once they start searching and see how involved it is. I've never had anyone feel that I was taking too long to "get to the good stuff", and most seem interested in seeing their grandparents, etc on the census as kids.

I also like the kitchen remodel analogy and will have to try that out sometime!

Subject: [BULKEMAIL] [Genealib] "Who Do You Think You Are" effect

I?m just curious if anyone has noticed an increase in patrons who are more impatient or come in with unrealistic expectations of what we can do for them since TV shows like Who Do You Think You Are, Genealogy Roadshow, and Finding Your Roots with Henry Louis Gates (as well as those ubiquitous Ancestry.com ?leaf? commercials) have become more popular in the last few years.

What steps have you taken to temper these kinds of expectations when you?re doing an initial reference interview?

I?d be interested to hear any specific ?horror? stories you might have.
I have been thinking about it since the new season of WDYTYA began last Sunday and I thought I?d ask the group for its thoughts.

Thanks in advance,
