

Media review published in Library Journal, October 15, 2011, 136 (17): 54.
http://www.libraryjournal.com/lj/reviews/videodvd/892087-286/video\_reviews\_october\_15\_2011.html.csp

Page One: Inside the New York Times. color. 92+ min. Andrew Rossi, History Films, dist. by Magnolia Home Entertainment, 2011. DVD

Is there a deathwatch on the New York Times? Is print media as a whole doomed? Do some stories need to go beyond databases? As relevant as the headlines themselves, these questions are central to this new documentary from the folks who created the award-winning An Inconvenient Truth; Food, Inc.; and Waiting for Superman. By examining the explosive WikiLeaks release of Iraqi video to YouTube, it is made clear that there is a new way to tell the public a story, and in Page One, the newspaper assesses its own relevancy. Profiles of many of the paper's fiercely dedicated employees such as David Carr and Tim Arango attest to a greater diversity of thought than its detractors may admit. They take hits from all sides of the political spectrum and come up swinging. Whether the New York Times is biased or not, its probability of survival is up to the viewers of this exceptional documentary. What is certain is that Page One is a worthy addition to all libraries.

By Gerald A. Notaro, Univ. of South Florida Lib., St. Petersburg